Report: Mossad hoping for comeback with Saddam hit

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
LONDON — A five-year-old plan to kill Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has been revived by the Mossad, which is anxious to reestablish its credentials after the attempt on the life of Hamas official Khaled Mashaal in Jordan last month. The plan, according to the London-based weekly newsletter Foreign Report, is based on an operation that was aborted after the Tze'elim-2 accident in 1992, in which six soldiers were killed during a live-fire dress-rehearsal on the eve of the mission. The newsletter reports that Mossad executives are confident that their information is as good as ever. The newsletter quotes a "well placed security source in Tel Aviv" as saying the commandos have already been told to carry out a feasibility study along the lines of the 1992 plan. "But our source warns that if this operation fails, there could almost be a war, because Israel would have to engage half its air force to bring the commandos home."

US-Iraq tensions flare

WASHINGTON (Reuters) — The US yesterday refused to rule out military action against Iraq, saying Baghdad had "made a mistake" by turning away two American members of a UN weapons inspection team. State Department spokesman James Rubin, asked if a military response to the Iraqi action was a possibility, said: "This is a very serious matter and we are not ruling any option out at this time."
Iraq, which announced on Wednesday that it would bar US members of UNSCOM, a UN commission overseeing demolition of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, turned back two American members of an UNSCOM team that flew in from Bahrain yesterday.

UK: Don't rule out attack, Page 8

"Iraq has made the mistake of trying to interfere with the business of the United Nations special commission," Rubin told a news briefing. "This is not an attack on the United States personnel. This is an attack on the very fundamentals of the UN system."
American UN envoy Bill Richardson called Iraq's action "very disturbing."
The US refusal to rule out military action followed similar statements by Britain and France.
The three countries spearheaded a coalition which drove Iraqi invasion forces out of Kuwait in the 1991 Gulf war.
Pentagon spokesman Ken Bacon refused to discuss the use of military force.
"This right now is a dispute between Iraq and the UN, and the Security Council is figuring out how to respond to it. We are working with the Security Council," he told reporters.

High school pupils continue strike

Tenth and 11th grade high school pupils across the nation are to stay away from classes again today to protest the continued cancellation of school trips due to a dispute between the Secondary Schools Teachers Association and the Education Ministry. They have vowed to continue their fight by striking different parts of the country this coming week.

The pupils are protesting the cancellation of annual outings, other school trips, and programs designed to prepare them for army service.

The teachers union is refusing to allow teachers to accompany the trips because the Education Ministry will not pay them to do so.

Man remanded for rape

Meir Filo, 33, of Eli, who is suspected of raping a minor in Karmei Shomron nine years ago, was remanded for six days by Kfar Sava Magistrate's Court yesterday. Judea and Samaria Police spokesman Opher Sivan said the girl, who was 15 at the time, only informed police of the rape this January. Filo, he said, had confessed. Sivan said the court hearing ordered a blackout on all details relating to the woman's identity and place of residence.

Netanyahu condemns political killings

Only weeks after the Mossad tried to assassinate Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said yesterday that he is against political killings under any circumstances. "It is forbidden to murder, it is forbidden to murder political leaders, and it doesn't matter who," he said in a speech to business leaders in Tel Aviv.

Netanyahu was reacting to a recent poll which showed surprising support among Israeli youths for the 1995 assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, and it was clear that his comments did not refer to Israel's longstanding policy of tracking down and killing terrorist leaders.

Drivers must use headlights on intercity roads

Beginning tomorrow, motorists will be required to drive with their headlights on while traveling between cities. The regulation is designed to improve a driver's ability to spot another vehicle in the winter months, especially on days with inclement weather conditions. Public vehicles (such as buses and taxis), as well as motorcycles and trucks, are required to utilize headlights on all roads, until March 31, when winter driving regulations end.

US pins big hopes on DC talks

By JAY BUSHINSKY

The US expects the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations that open under its sponsorship in Washington on Monday to produce concrete and possibly dramatic results ranging from a slew of bilateral agreements on a Gaza Strip airport and seaport to the ceremonial launching of the first joint industrial park that will straddle the border at Karni.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright is prepared for at least one full week of dialogue between the parties while the nine committees charged with dealing with the practical aspects of the peace process carry on with their work virtually under the same American roof.

"Rather than convene the sessions at the State Department, they probably will be held outside Washington, possibly at the State Department's college," an authoritative source said.

Foreign Ministry Director-General Eitan Bentsur believes Albright will urge the two sides to participate in the "festive signing" of at least one major agreement and for immediate steps to follow for its implementation.

"The infrastructure at Karni is ready," he said. "If the deal is concluded funding can be anticipated from the International Bank."

In contrast, the Palestinian side has been on a comparatively low-keyed tack, pressing the secretary of state to nail down the precise extent of Israel's next troop pullback in the West Bank and elicit a commitment to stop all settlement construction for a prescribed period of time.

PA Chairman Yasser Arafat has been appealing to Albright to become actively and constantly involved in the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations to the extent that she would participate in them whenever her presence was deemed necessary by either side.

Reports that Foreign Minister David Levy will offer a nine-month settlement freeze in return for a concomitant postponement of the IDF's next pullback in the West Bank were dismissed as "nonsense" by his aides yesterday, as they made last-minute preparations for his talks in Washington with the Palestinian Authority's Mahmoud Abbas.

"Our concepts and proposals are secret at this stage," said Freddy Eitan, one of Levy's senior advisers. He inferred that the contents of a purported package deal said to have been worked out at a special inner cabinet meeting were little more than a float launched by interested parties.

Eitan indicated that it would make little sense from a diplomatic standpoint for Levy's ideas to be revealed in the local news media before they were presented at his meeting Monday with Abbas under the aegis of Albright.

The Israeli delegation, headed by Levy and including a battery of Foreign Ministry aides, advisers, and heads of the joint Israeli-PA committees negotiating in the framework of the Oslo Accords, is due to leave on Sunday and to arrive in the US just over 24 hours before the tri-lateral session.

Asked if Levy would propose a time-out in settlement activity in return for a postponement of the next IDF redeployment, Foreign Ministry Spokesman Aviv Shir-On said: "He can conduct negotiations on all issues on the agenda." Shir-On qualified this by stressing that "decisions are made by the Israeli government." PA Chairman Yasser Arafat was described by Reuters as harboring doubts about Levy's having a mandate to facilitate implementation of 34 interim issues, foremost among them another West Bank troop withdrawal and a settlement freeze.

Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu's spokesman Shai Bazak refused to relate to a report in the Nazareth weekly A-Sinara that there had been secret talks between the prime minister's special adviser, Yitzhak Molcho, and the chairman of the PA's Legislative Council Ahmed Qurei (Abu Ala) about the projected final status negotiations.

The two have met from time to time, but they evidently did not pave the way for Levy's meeting with Abbas.

Hillel Kuntler adds from Washington: The State Department confirmed yesterday that Israeli-Palestinian negotiations are to resume here next week and run for several days.

"The meetings are scheduled to take place next Monday, and we hope that all the parties are prepared to negotiate seriously," State Department spokesman James Rubin told reporters.

"We are ready to put our shoulder to the wheel to adopt a serious effort in putting these meetings together, and if the parties are willing to negotiate seriously, then there will be a serious negotiation." Albright will likely participate in the opening session "and as appropriate in the course of them," Rubin said. The negotiations will take place in the Washington area, though not at the State Department, he added.

Rubin and another US official would not discuss the reasons behind the delay in Levy's departure. But the US official said the US was satisfied that the discussions would take place, even a few days late.

The agenda was laid out by Albright during her meeting with Levy and Abbas at the UN last month. It includes a discussion of the time-out concept, the question of IDF redeployment, and how to move into discussions of final status issues.

The discussion over a "time out" will include not only Albright's call for a recess in Israeli settlement activity, but also a stop to the Palestinians' habit of involving the UN whenever negotiations with Israel bog down, the US official said.

Asked whether the US believes that Israel must carry out its redeployment commitments, Rubin stated: "What we have said in the past is that we do believe further redeployment should go forward. This is obviously a subject for discussion. As you know the previous Israeli proposal for a [first] further redeployment did not receive plaudits from the Palestinian side, but we do want to see the further redeployment and other aspects of the Oslo Accords implemented in full."

PA holding talks with Hamas to stop terror

By STEVE RODAN

The Palestinian Authority is negotiating a deal with Hamas to temporarily stop Islamic terrorism against Israel, and as a goodwill gesture has already freed 38 Islamic militants arrested last month, Palestinian and Israeli officials said yesterday.

The officials said the effort has been launched by PA Chairman Yasser Arafat so that the PA and Hamas could present a joint front against Israel during the forthcoming talks with Israel and the US in Washington.

The effort is also to ensure that the Islamic opposition will not seek to campaign against what is expected to be the PA's decision to send representatives to the Middle East economic conference in Doha.

In return for a halt in terrorism, Hamas has demanded the release of all its members imprisoned in PA prisons and permission to reopen the organization's institutions, officials said.

About 100 Hamas and Jihad activists were arrested in the PA crackdown following the September suicide bombing attack on Jerusalem's Rehov Ben-Ze'ev.

A senior Israeli security source said Arafat has already begun carrying out his part of the deal. The Hamas newspaper Al-Risalah will begin publishing next week and both the source and PA officials expect more Hamas institutions to reopen over the next month.

In addition, the PA has released 38 members of Hamas and Islamic Jihad detained after the Ben-Yehuda bombing.

The released prisoners include Hani Hassan Rahim, an Islamic Jihad militant who was involved in the suicide bombing in Dizengoff Center in March of last year. The freed detainees also include five senior members of Hamas.

The Islamic militants were freed over the past two weeks. Their release has led Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu to consider delaying negotiations with the PA, the source said.

Some PA officials are considering the prospect of forming what they described as a national unity government that would include Hamas representatives, Palestinian sources said. They said the proposal would also alleviate the growing criticism of corruption within the PA.

One of those promoting the idea is Palestinian Legislative Council member Rawya Shawwa of Gaza, who discussed a unity government with Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin on Wednesday. At the meeting, Palestinian sources said, Yassin said his organization has proposed a temporary cease-fire to demonstrate that Israel does not want peace.

But Yassin rejected the idea of Hamas entering the PA Cabinet.

Instead, he said Hamas would agree to participating in municipal elections in the territories, which so far have been delayed by Arafat. "They don't have a clear plan," Shawwa told The Jerusalem Post. "But they want to share power. He [Yassin] said he doesn't agree with Oslo. I said I don't agree with Oslo either."

Shawwa said she and other PLC members are pressing Arafat to reopen Hamas-operated institutions, which included charities and social service groups.

Palestinian officials caught driving stolen cars

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH, STEVE RODAN and MOHAMMED NAJIB

Two senior Palestinian officials were arrested this week as they attempted to enter the Gaza Strip in stolen vehicles.

Palestinian Legislative Council member Moussa Abu Sabha was caught as he attempted to drive a stolen Mercedes past the Erez checkpoint Tuesday night. And yesterday morning police arrested Palestinian intelligence official Gen Zachiya Balusha as he tried to drive a stolen BMW into Gaza.

Abu Sabha, who until last year was a member of the PA Preventive Security Apparatus, has a VIP card permitting him free passage between Israel and the territories. But police, who knew that five Mercedes had recently been stolen from a Jerusalem car lot, checked the car's engine number, and found it to be one of the stolen vehicles.

Palestinian sources said Abu Sabha, who represents the Hebron district, was one of several PLC members and PA officials in the area that use their VIP status to conduct their private business. This, they said, included using their cars to bring in smuggled goods from Israel into the territories.

The sources said Abu Sabha was known in the Hebron area as being involved in thefts of both sheep and cars in the past. "This is a case of how the big get bigger," a Palestinian source in Hebron said. "This behavior is standard fare for PA and many PLC members."

Abu Sabha claimed he had taken the car to a repair shop in Ramallah for a friend, and that he didn't know the car was stolen. But his alibi didn't check out, and he was remanded for five days by the Jerusalem Magistrate's Court. Police told the court that if he was released, he would flee to Gaza and escape prosecution.

Balusha was caught when police at Erez became suspicious of the BMW that he was riding in. Upon checking the car's registration papers, they learned it had been stolen from the Tel Aviv area several days before.

Since Balusha was only being driven and said he knew nothing about the car, he was not held and permitted to cross into Gaza. Balusha's driver was arrested.

A senior security source said that several Palestinian Authority officials are suspected of being involved in a car-theft and drug-smuggling ring in the Hebron area.

The source said Israeli authorities suspect that members of the Palestinian Preventive Security Apparatus are involved in the criminal activities, which involve both Israelis and Arabs on both sides of the Green Line.

In some cases, the Palestinian drug smuggling ring has formed links with Jewish criminals, who are bringing illegal substances in Israel and some Jewish settlements, the source said.

Israeli police are trying to induce their Palestinian counterparts to cooperate in stopping the drug-smuggling but so far the cooperation has been limited. On Monday, two Israeli men were arrested by the Palestinian Police on suspicion of trying to smuggle marijuana into Hebron.

Meanwhile, Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani told reporters he feared that high-ranking Palestinian officials were not only involved in smuggling cars into the territories, but also weapons and ammunition.

Kahalani vowed to raise the issue in Sunday's cabinet meeting.

PA Local Affairs Minister Saeb Erekat asked that Kahalani refrain from making sweeping generalizations about the Palestinian Authority.

The PLC said it would investigate the Abu Sabha arrest. In a session on Wednesday, Abu Sabha's arrest was mentioned although he was not named.

Palestinian sources said PLC speaker Ahmed Qurei was asked by Attorney General Fayez Abu Rahme to lift Abu Sabha's immunity so he could be prosecuted.

Qurei said the PLC will discuss the arrest and study the evidence against him soon.

Abu Sabha was a Fatah activist during the Palestinian uprising and spent six months in administrative detention in 1989-90. A Preventive Security Apparatus source refused to confirm that Abu Sabha was a member of the agency but said that he participated in the Palestinian delegation in Madrid in 1991.

According to Israel Radio, from the beginning of the year to the end of September, 33,000 vehicles have been stolen in Israel. Police fear that the majority of the cars have already reached autonomous areas.

List Collins adds:

Tomer MK Eliezer Zandberg has filed an urgent motion to the agenda in the Knesset on the car thefts. Zandberg is suggesting that the cost of the car thefts to Israel be deducted from the funds being transferred by Israel to the PA.

Arafat mulls disbanding anti-Israeli intelligence

By STEVE RODAN and MOHAMMED NAJIB

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is considering disbanding an intelligence service that targets Israel for espionage, in response to a demand by the Netanyahu government for a goodwill gesture to prove the Palestinian desire for better relations, a senior Palestinian source said yesterday.

The source said Arafat is being asked to eliminate the PA military intelligence service, established in 1994 and headed by Col. Mussa Arafat, uncle of the PA chief. The service focuses on collecting intelligence on the Israeli military, but also has been accused of torturing Palestinians, including Yusef Baba from Nablus earlier this year.

The Palestinian source said Arafat is exploring the option of merging the military intelligence with two other security agencies - the Preventive Security Apparatus headed by Col. Jibril Rajoub and the General Intelligence Service headed by Col. Tawfiq Tirawi.

Bassem Eid, director of the Palestinian Human Rights Monitoring Group, said he favors such a move. "We would welcome the disbanding of the military intelligence apparatus, which has arrested and tortured Palestinians in the most brutal of ways," he said. "But we hope that after it is disbanded, it will not be assimilated into other agencies."

Dor Shalom Jerusalem office torched

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER

Jerusalem police are investigating the Wednesday night torching of the local office of the Dor Shalom peace activist group. The burning of the office on Pierre Koenig Street in the Talpiot industrial zone took place between midnight and 1 a.m., according to Tammi Molad-Hayo, the regional director of the organization.

"Someone poured flammable liquid in the entranceway and ignited it," she said. "The fire department checked for electrical failure, and this morning they said it definitely was arson."

Police said they have no leads on who might have done it, but are taking it very seriously. "I understand from what they've said that they have a few suspects, but they wouldn't tell us yet," said Molad-Hayo.

It is the first time there has been any trouble with the Jerusalem office of Dor Shalom, or Peace Generation, although Molad-Hayo said that the main office in Tel Aviv has received anonymous threats over the phone, as well as on E-mail and at their Web site whenever the organization organizes a large rally.

Damage to the office, which also serves as an activity center for young children, was estimated in the thousands of shekels, including cupboards, desks, chairs, and the front door. It was still unknown whether the computer there was still operable, as the electricity was short circuited.

"The place is ruined," said Molad-Hayo. "The wall-to-wall carpets have to be replaced, and we'll have to paint the walls and the ceilings. The place looks terrible. It was such a cute, warm, welcoming place, till last night. Some of the things we have here is stuff that people donated, so now we'll have to buy everything new, and it won't be easy."

She said it is ironic that the incident took place a week before the November 4 anniversary of Yitzhak Rabin's assassination.

"It's like nothing happened, like we didn't learn anything," Molad-Hayo said. "But we're not going to let it stop us. We're going to rebuild the branch here, and we're going to make a big comeback."

Russia names Mideast peace envoy

By JAY BUSHINSKY

Russia's appointment of a Middle East peace envoy evoked a ood from Israeli officials yesterday, along with comments to the effect that it is a positive step in the direction of a common goal.

Although the new Russian role and the man selected to fill it were mentioned in Beirut at the start of Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov's week-long tour of the region, confirmation did not come until its last leg in Cairo.

Deputy Foreign Minister Viktor Possovalyuk will join the peace-making club, alongside the US's Dennis Ross and the European Union's Miguel Moratinos. Primakov announced the new assignment after conferring with Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa.

A senior government official said Russia's prospective role as a mediator will be complicated by its ongoing supply of ballistic missile technology to Iran. He noted that China's commitment to halt weapons shipments to Teheran leaves Moscow in a potentially untenable position insofar as regional peacemaking is concerned.

Possovalyuk's career includes a stint as the former USSR's ambassador to Iraq. He also headed the Russian Foreign Ministry's Middle East division.

His Arabic is fluent and enabled him to serve as an interpreter for various Soviet leaders.

Families quarrel at monument to helicopter victims

By DAVID RIDGE

A verbal argument broke out between bereaved families yesterday during the unveiling of monuments near Beit Jam in memory of the 73 victims of the February helicopter disaster.

Ya'acov Gottlieb said the families would not allow the disaster - in which so many had died because of "terrible negligence" - to be pushed aside.

Gottlieb's comments caused a stir among the bereaved families. One man shouted his disapproval, charging that Gottlieb was not speaking on behalf of all the parents. This caused more disturbances, as some parents reacted to the disruption and others called for calm.

OC Northern Command Maj. Gen. Amram Levine called on the bereaved parents, who had already undergone enough pain and suffering, not to take out their anger and frustration on one another.

The monuments were erected by Beit Jam resident Majid Kazamel in memory of his son, Fhadi, who was killed in the disaster and another for the remaining victims.

'Pope's theologian' says Christianity fueled antisemitism

VATICAN CITY (Reuters) - A top Catholic theologian, opening a Vatican symposium here yesterday on antisemitism, said Christian religious prejudices against Jews had stifled the capacity of people to react to antisemitism in the Nazi era.

The statement by Father Georges Cottier, sometimes known as "the pope's theologian," is considered significant because of his closeness to Pope John Paul.

The symposium began as a leading Jewish group, again called on the Vatican to open its files on the Holocaust.

Cottier said the symposium was called to study "prejudices and pseudo-theological judgments... which served as pretexts for the unjustifiable vexations suffered by the Jewish people in the course of their history."

"These prejudices, so to speak, stifled the capacity for evangelical reaction among many people when Europe was engulfed by the antisemitism of National Socialism," he said in a keynote address.

The symposium, entitled "Roots of Anti-Judaism in Christian Circles," focuses on religious attitudes towards Jews in Christian teaching over the past 2,000 years and how this affected history.

It was not until the 1960s that the Roman Catholic Church officially repudiated the concept of Jewish guilt for Jesus's death and eliminated the phrase "perfidious Jews" from the liturgy of a Holy Week service.

Cottier said the gathering would help Christians make an "historical examination of conscience" in time for the start of the third millennium. The pope has said several times in recent years that the entire Roman Catholic Church should use the start of the third millennium as a chance to seek forgiveness for past errors and sins.

Some 60 leading Catholic theologians and representatives from Protestant and Orthodox Christianity are attending the three-day closed-door meeting. No Jews are taking part.

"The problem which concerns us belongs to Christian theology," Cottier said in apparent response to some suggestions that Jews should have been invited.

But while Catholics look at themselves in a theological mirror, Jews want a more concrete gesture. The symposium will "miss the point if it does not fully open the pages to... the period of the Holocaust," Shimoo Samuels, the Simon Wiesenthal Center's director for international liaison, said in an open letter to the pope earlier this week.

Samuels, who is based in Paris, said Catholic-Jewish relations "will continue to be exacerbated" if the archives of the Pontificate of Pope Pius XII "are not fully accessible." Jews have accused the Vatican and wartime Pope Pius XII of turning a blind eye as the Nazis killed some six million Jews. Samuels called on the Vatican to open the archives of Pius's pontificate to an independent international commission and to begin a "Holocaust education curriculum" in Catholic schools.

Renovations planned for Old City's Jewish Quarter

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER

A blueprint is being developed for a major renovation of the Jewish Quarter of Jerusalem's Old City. It includes plans to reopen a sealed gate in the Old City wall some 50 meters east of Zion Gate.

The plan, initiated by Deputy Housing Minister Meir Porush through the ministry's Company for Renovating and Developing the Jewish Quarter, calls for a $30 million, two-story underground complex that would include an apartment-hotel, a commercial center, and educational institutions.

A spokeswoman for the Housing Authority said the blueprint is three to four months away from being a final plan, after which it will be presented first to the board of directors of the company, and then to the Ministerial Committee on Jerusalem.

"It's a question of money, a question of budget," said spokesman Moshe Eilat. "Whether [Finance Minister Yaakov] Neeman will allocate money for the project - there are many questions about it. Porush wants it, and there are many who support it, including Mayor [Ehud] Olmert."

A spokeswoman for the mayor said the city had no comment on the plan, as it had not yet been finalized or submitted for approval.

The head archaeologist of the Antiquities Authority said he opposed creating a new gate in the Old City's wall, as it would harm the character of the 460-year-old historical structure.

The ministry's plan to open another gate is part of an effort to improve access to the Old City, which is severely strained by vehicular traffic inside its four-kilometer-long wall, as well as to build up the Jewish Quarter in order to increase its population of 2,400 by 25 percent.

1,738 family violence files opened in TA

More than 1,700 files relating to family violence were opened in the first nine months of the year in the Tel Aviv police district, police said yesterday at a study day on family violence. Deputy Insp.-Gen. Cmdr. Gabi Last said police are trying to better deal with family violence in the Arab and haredi communities by hiring women investigators that members of these sectors can relate to.

Judge Amnon Strashnov caused a small furor when he warned police not to be taken in by, for example, "a woman who files a rape complaint against her husband to extort more money in a divorce settlement."

Na'amat official Ronit Lev-Ari interrupted Strashnov angrily, and later said that remarking on the exceptions as he did foils attempts to get family violence taken seriously. Iim

Sara Netanyahu sues to surpress ex's material

Sara Netanyahu appeared in court yesterday to try to prevent her ex-husband, Doron Neuberger, from publishing letters she had sent him and tapes of their conversations.

Four months ago she charged in a TV interview that Neuberger had secretly recorded her when they were married. Neuberger, 37, admits having such tapes but denies they were made in secret.

Last year Neuberger dropped plans to write a kiss-and-tell memoir about their failed marriage after what he cryptically termed "very heavy pressure."

Now Netanyahu is asking for a court injunction that would prevent any publication of the materials Neuberger has. She appealed to a special court for family disputes that holds its sessions behind closed doors. AP

Court rejects Hai Vekayam petition

The High Court of Justice yesterday rejected a petition by Hai Vekayam to block the reroofing of an area above the new mosque in the Solomon's Stables area of the Temple Mount. Hai Vekayam asked the court to order the authorities to enforce the building code and other regulations pertaining to the site. Justices Yitzhak Zamir, Dalia Dorner, and Yitzhak Englard ruled that the flooring work involves replacing worn out flooring and does not constitute a change requiring planning board or other approval. Iim

ULA wants to aid allergy sufferers

The Union of Local Authorities has asked all municipal authorities and local councils to adopt a by-law barring the planting within their borders of tree varieties that are especially liable to make allergic residents miserable. According to council chairman Adi Eldar, only Arad has such a by-law. Cypress, tamarisk, olive, pecan, date palm, and other trees produce pollen that is especially allergenic. These species aggravate the conditions of the 600,000 Israelis suffering from hay fever, asthma, chronic rhinitis, and allergic ophthalmological conditions. Judy Siegel

Chinese president visits US Congress

By LAURA MYERS

WASHINGTON (AP) — Addressing some of his toughest critics, Chinese President Jiang Zemin defended his human rights record yesterday and extended a hand of friendship to the US Congress.

His meeting came a day after Jiang and President Clinton sparred over differences, but ended their talks as "old friends." Since China opened to the world in the 1970s, "the Chinese people have enjoyed a much better life, and it has intensified efforts to improve democracy and the legal system," Jiang told about 50 lawmakers at a breakfast in one of the ornate chambers of the Capitol.

He urged "vigorous efforts in improving and developing China-US relations." Congressional leaders — Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, House Speaker Newt Gingrich, and their Democratic counterparts, Sen. Tom Daschle and Rep. Dick Gephardt — met with Jiang privately, too.

Although several lawmakers welcomed Jiang at Wednesday night's White House state dinner, like Clinton, they did not mince words with him yesterday morning.

"We do not believe that freedom is limited by geography or by history — we believe that all men and women should be able to live, work, and speak free from governmental interference," Lott said.

Gingrich, a former history professor, gave Jiang a tour of the Capitol Rotunda, showing him a painting of the signing of the Declaration of Independence and guiding him to a replica of the Magna Carta, the 13th-century English document guaranteeing civil and political liberties.

"I reminded our Chinese guests that you cannot have economic freedom without political freedom, and you cannot have political freedom without religious freedom," Gingrich said. "You cannot have a system that is half totalitarian and half free. It will not survive."

Jiang wasn't met by protesters when he arrived on Capitol Hill. On Wednesday, more than 1,000 demonstrators shouted anti-China, pro-Tibet, and pro-Taiwan slogans across from the White House.

Later yesterday, Jiang was heading to Philadelphia, where he planned to see historic Independence Hall. His eight-day US tour, which ends Sunday in Los Angeles, is part of the first state visit by a Chinese leader in 12 years.

His wife, Madame Wang Yeping, visited a Washington school yesterday. Some lawmakers have unsuccessfully moved every year since the 1989 massacre of pro-democracy demonstrators in Tiananmen Square to cut normal trade relations between China and the United States as punishment.

They continue to talk tough about the growing US-China trade deficit approaching $44 billion this year, Beijing's plans to reclaim Taiwan — some fear by military force — and the communist regime's brutal persecution of Buddhists in Tibet and other worshippers throughout China.

Criticizing the groundbreaking nuclear deal the two presidents agreed to on Wednesday, lawmakers say they distrust assurances from China that it will halt atomic weapons assistance to other nations, particularly Iran. In exchange, Beijing will be able to huy nuclear reactors and technology from American companies, which stand to make deals worth billions of dollars.

Democratic Rep. Edward J. Markey said he would move to tighten the 1985 US-China Nuclear Cooperation Law that Clinton will certify to seal the agreement with China. Congress has 30 days to consider Clinton's certification, which he said he would send to Capitol Hill.

"Before we start flooding China with advanced nuclear technology, we must insist on public, unambiguous, and tangible Chinese commitments that are subject to congressional scrutiny," Markey said.

Clinton, in confronting Jiang on human rights at a joint news conference after their summit Wednesday, said he was "very pleased" the Chinese president was visiting the roots of American democracy and freedom.

"It was there that our founders set forth the beliefs that define and inspire our nation to this very day," Clinton said of Philadelphia. "We believe all individuals, as a condition of their humanity, have the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

In their lively back-and-forth display of divergent views, Clinton told Jiang the US and China have "profound disagreements" on human rights and Beijing is "on the wrong side of history" about Tiananmen.

Jiang adamantly defended the bloody crackdown as the "correct conclusion" by the government. And he insisted China's human rights policies are a matter in which other nations should not interfere.

"The world we are living in is a rich and diverse one, and, therefore, the concepts on democracy and human rights and on freedoms are relative," he lectured, telling Clinton each country should make its own rules.

In the end, the leaders shook hands, smiled, and Clinton put his arm at Jiang's back to escort him from the room. The Chinese leader, noting this was his fifth meeting, said, "We are already old friends."

Two harsh China critics, Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman Jesse Helms and Rep. Benjamin Gilman, chairman of the House International Relations Committee, scored Clinton for warmly welcoming Jiang, but both greeted Jiang at the state dinner.

China "emphasizes the lack of human rights," said Helms. "The administration's policy toward China has been an abject failure. Helms means both utterly hopeless and shamelessly servile."

Said Gilman, a New York Republican: "The president has described his policy toward China as one of constructive engagement. I think it has been more on the order of appeasement."

Egyptian bus attackers sentenced to death

By ESMAT SALAHEDDIN

CAIRO (Reuters) — An Egyptian military court yesterday sentenced two brothers to death for a bus attack in which nine German tourists and an Egyptian driver were killed.

Saber Farahat Abu Ela and his brother Mahmoud had pleaded guilty to the charges of premeditated murder, attacking tourists, and damaging the economy through violence and terrorism.

Seven other men had been charged with providing the weapons used in the attack. Of these, one was sentenced to 10 years at hard labor and five to prison terms ranging from 15 months to seven years. One man was acquitted.

At the start of the trial that began on October 14, Saber Ela said his only regret was that the victims of the September 18 attack in central Cairo had not been Jews.

Saber has said he espouses Islamist ideology, but was not a member of any of the Moslem militant groups that have been waging a bloody campaign to topple the government. Some have attacked tourists in an effort to cripple the economy.

In a statement earlier this month, the largest group, al-Gama'a al-Islamiya (Islamic Group), hailed the "mujahideen" brothers and warned tourists not to come to Egypt.

Military court verdicts cannot be appealed, but sentences can only be carried out after they have been approved by the president as supreme commander of the armed forces.

Officials say Saber has a certificate saying he is mentally unstable and escaped from the hospital where he was committed after killing three foreigners in a Cairo hotel in 1993.

Saber says he paid a doctor to fake the certificate. The doctor and other officials at the mental hospital have been put on trial on charges of taking bribes from Saber to allow him to come and go at will.

President Hosni Mubarak began to refer Islamist militants to the speedy justice of military courts in 1992, ignoring criticism from human rights groups. So far 90 death sentences have been issued and 57 carried out, all but two by hanging.

The bus attack in Cairo's crowded Tahrir Square was the first on tourists since Gama'a activists shot dead 18 Greek tourists; mistook for Israelis in April 1996.

Nearly 1,100 people, including 34 foreigners, have been killed in a five-year armed campaign by Moslem militants to set up a purist Islamic state in Egypt.

Tel Aviv's air among worst in country

By LIAT COLLINS

Tel Aviv residents cannot breathe easy, at least not according to the latest survey by the Environment Ministry, which shows that air pollution in the "city that never sleeps" is among the worst in the country. The main culprit is vehicular exhaust.

Ministry Director-General Nehama Ronen said this week that the survey shows the worst times for air pollution in Tel Aviv are the morning and afternoon rush hours and between 11 p.m. and 2 a.m. "It seems the city's slogan about never stopping is true," she said.

A team, including representatives of the Interior Ministry, Tel Aviv Municipality, and the Transport Ministry, will meet soon to decide upon measures to relieve the situation. One step under consideration is closing the city to traffic on days when climatic factors make the threat of pollution particularly severe, as happens in other major cities around the world such as Paris. These measures would not cancel out the need to continue working on plans for a subway system, Ronen said.

Ronen said an epidemiological survey has shown that children in certain Tel Aviv neighborhoods are more likely to suffer from asthma and other respiratory problems than their peers elsewhere.

Four out of five air quality monitoring stations in the central area — the first to be established as part of a national monitoring network — this month recorded deviations above the national standard for air pollutants.

Decisions should be taken to lower the sulfur content of fuels used in the refineries and ensure that automobile tests include checking that vehicles are fitted with catalytic converters, Ronen said.

Who fears final status?

After a seven-hour cabinet meeting this week, Foreign Minister David Levy finally had his marching orders for the meeting on Monday with Palestinian Authority deputy leader Mahmud Abbas and US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. The deal Israel seems to be proposing - a limited "time-out" in settlement growth in exchange for postponing the Oslo Accord's second redeployment - has been advocated by this newspaper as both fair and good for the peace process. If the Palestinians will not agree to anything along these lines, it will be fair to suspect that the problem is not with the specific deal, but with their readiness to go to final-status talks with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government.

Sometimes it looks as if PA Chairman Yasser Arafat regards the Netanyahu government as a nightmare from which he is waiting to wake up. A few months ago, after US officials recovered from their own state of denial, American mediator Dennis Ross reportedly told Arafat that he had better plan on Netanyahu staying put at least until the next elections in the year 2000. It is not clear whether that message sank in then, and if it did, that Arafat might not have begun daydreaming again following Netanyahu's recent troubles.

As long as Arafat believes that a more pliable Israeli government could be around the corner, it is not entirely surprising that he is in no hurry to enter into final status talks. Arafat's waiting game has created a strange situation in which the Palestinians, who have been struggling for a generation to convince Israel to negotiate on the basis of "territory for peace," are now balking when Israel is almost begging to do just that.

It is not that Israel really expects the final-status agreement to be more pleasant to negotiate or easier to implement than Oslo itself; it is that final status at least has a prospect of a payoff - peace - while the interim agreement gives Israel mostly heartache. Israel can credit Oslo for paving the way to peace with Jordan and for dissolving much of what was left of the Arab economic boycott, but the commitment most immediate to Israelis - to vigorously combat terrorism - has been largely reneged upon by the Palestinians.

Despite and because of Oslo's problems, there is no reason to doubt Netanyahu's seriousness about plunging into final-status talks. Such is, ironically, the triumph of the Oslo Accords: they have made Israel yearn to begin the most difficult part of the process. Oslo was supposed to be a means to the end of a final peace agreement. Now Oslo is like a booster rocket that has accomplished its task: Israel wants to get on with the exploration of new worlds, risks and all, while the Palestinians are still trying to squeeze some more momentum from the booster.

The challenge now is to persuade Arafat to take yes for an answer: yes to a deal in which a rightist Israeli government limits settlements, and yes to a compromise over territories that Israel has held for 30 years. But as long as Arafat can say no and have Netanyahu blamed for his stalling, why say yes? Arafat is already warning that the much-anticipated meeting in Washington will be a "waste of time." It will be a waste of time, or worse, unless the United States convinces Arafat that this "crisis" has gone on long enough, and that they will blow the lid off his stalling tactics if he continues to refuse to take yes for an answer.

If Arafat is indeed stalling because he is waiting for Netanyahu to fall or for a unity government to arise, he should think again. Though many expect that Netanyahu will have to bring in Labor in order to pass a final peace agreement, by this reasoning the more Arafat delays final status talks, the more he delays a unity government. Alternatively, if Arafat thinks that more waiting will escalate the crisis and bring down Netanyahu completely, again he is mistaken. Despite the general antipathy toward Netanyahu, the international community has also become convinced that Arafat must deliver on his commitments to combat terrorism. Even Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov mentioned this at his press conference with Arafat. A future security crisis is more likely to strengthen Netanyahu and weaken Arafat than the opposite.

The fact that Arafat has milked the current crisis to the point of diminishing returns should not be considered a failure for him, but a victory. It is quite remarkable that Arafat is on the brink of securing any limitation on settlement growth from Netanyahu's government. It would be a major mistake for the Palestinians or the US to be so greedy as to demand a freeze that includes natural growth, something that did not occur even under Rabin and Peres. The parties should push to conclude the package deal that seems so close to gelling, and which holds the promise of bringing the peace process to a new plane.

Disappearing common values

MARK A. HELLER

Consider this. Israel has a foreign minister who has spent hardly any time abroad and speaks no English, and it has a prime minister who lived much of his adult life in the United States (including two senior diplomatic appointments) and speaks fluent, unaccented American English. The former is a welcome guest in Washington, though he has been reluctant to go; the latter wants very much to go, but he can't get an invitation.

This is not just because Bill Clinton's dance-card is too full to squeeze in another visiting dignitary. Clinton, along with many other people who matter in the United States, has apparently decided that this prime minister is a lost cause: either he won't commit himself to do what needs to be done, or he will commit himself but fail to follow through. As a result, Benjamin Netanyahu's credibility is so low that official Washington is unwilling to give him the time of day.

What's more, there is now no political penalty to be paid for snubbing the prime minister of Israel, because neither Congress nor American Jewry will rally to his side. This is a new and potentially ominous development, and the reason goes far beyond unhappiness with Netanyahu's policies on secure peace.

Since 1967, Israeli and American governments have often had very sharp differences about what needed to be done. But even when those differences were most acute, Israel always had an ace in the hole to shield it from the worst of administration wrath: supportive American public opinion, energized by American Jews and reflected in the attitudes of Congress.

Sympathy for Israel stemmed from its image as a tolerant, pluralistic island of democracy in a sea of autocracy, a new society which welcomed down-trodden immigrants from around the world, a people which respected and embraced religion but kept it separate from the state, and a country which sought peace but defended itself bravely when there was no choice. In short, Israel was a kind of mirror-image of the United States, and when Americans looked at Israel, they believed that they saw themselves.

For many years, Israeli governments, especially those dominated by the Likud, tried to persuade themselves, and anyone else who

In an age of universal real-time communications, it is impossible to conceal behavior that makes Israeli politics more and more remote from the normative universe of most American Jews, and most others who make or influence American policy.

To get a sense of the gap between the American ethic and emerging Israeli reality, look at how the notion of "coercion" is folded into the debate about the conversion bill and the religious councils bill. Orthodox Rabbis in Israel want to preserve the camel that provides forced to abandon their spiritual guides and resort to Conservative or Reform rabbis.

The use of state power to define "authentic" religion and enforce compliance with it is completely contrary to the American ethos; a recent move by the Russian Parliament to recognize only four genuine religions and to designate Russian Orthodoxy as official Christianity came in for such vigorous criticism in Congress that Secretary of State Albright expressed concern about its effect on the future of American-Russian relations. It is also anathema to most American (and other Diaspora) Jews, for whom religious-communal affiliation in general, and personal status in particular, are - or should be - matters of personal choice.

Disagreements about the second redeployment can cause some unpleasantness, but domestic Israeli developments threaten to bring about a sea-change in Israeli-American relations. Many of those who influence (or dictate) Netanyahu's agenda don't know or don't care, but the prime minister knows better. That is why he is ambivalent about going to the General Assembly of Jewish organizations next month in Denver.

But knowing is one thing, doing is something else. Unless Netanyahu stops subordinating long-term strategic needs to short-term political calculations, the common values that link Israel and the United States will continue to weaken. If there's no White House welcome mat for Netanyahu, he can at least take comfort in another visit to Rabbi Kadouri. But the rest of the country will be out in the cold.

would listen, that this was all sentimental claptrap, and that what really mattered was a hard-headed calculation of national interest. Since Israel was an indispensable "strategic asset" in the Cold War struggle for the destiny of the world, the US would never push Israel to the breaking point, no matter how much exception it might take to Israeli policy in the Arab-Israeli conflict.

That argument was always dubious, and it is now also anachronistic. So "sentimental claptrap" is all that's left. And this prime minister, by pandering to the forces of sectarianism, dogma, superstition and intolerance, is doing everything to ensure that the commonality of values that links the United States and Israel will also become an anachronism.

jobs for otherwise unemployable seminary graduates in the councils and rabbinical courts that operate the personal status "industry" (marriage, divorce, burial, etc.) in this country. To do this, they get religious politicians to use the power of the state executive and legislature - though not the judiciary - to reaffirm their monopoly to define what is "authentic" Judaism and who is an "authentic" Jew, and to force everyone who is not a oon-Jew to use their services.

Yet when Reform and Conservative Jews try to break the establishment Orthodox monopoly and introduce an element of voluntarism, "they" are accused by hard-line MK Avraham Ravitz of trying to force their views on "us" - as if his constituents and Shas leader Ovadiah Yosef's will somehow be Assad's war calculus

GERALD M. STEINBERG

For the past year, a number of Israeli analysts have been discussing and predicting a Syrian surprise attack, designed to take some, if not all of the Golan Heights by force.

The argument for a Syrian "quick grab" is based on a combination of political and military factors, including the stalled peace process, the appearance of a tougher line in the negotiating positions of the Netanyahu government, the perception of internal divisions and lack of confidence in Israel, and the rift between Washington and Jerusalem.

The authors of these scenarios emphasize the missiles and chemical warheads that are at the disposal of the Syrian generals, along with thousands of tanks, and a growing array of combat aircraft. The use, or even the threat of chemical weapons could severely hamper the mobilization of reserve forces and air force operations, and cause panic in Israel's cities. As a result, the planners in Damascus might conclude that even without the aid of Egypt, they could capture the Golan and gain a cease-fire before the IDF has time to respond effectively.

While the IDF must be prepared for such an attack, Syrian President Hafez Assad, always cautious, has many other factors to consider, and in the big picture, this option does not look very good. Militarily, Syria is still far from "strategic parity" with Israel and faces a possible second front on the Turkish border. Politically, by initiating a war, Assad risks undermining his own regime and the eviction of Syrian occupying forces from Lebanon.

The last time the Syrians tried to take the Golan, in 1973, they lost ground and paid a very heavy price. Israeli artillery is still sitting on the Golan Heights, ready to pound Damascus. Assad also knows that if he were to use any of his chemical weapons, the force of the Israeli retaliation would be overwhelming.

Economically, Assad's hard-line policies have cost the Syrian people dearly. While Egypt and Jordan have finally begun to move toward of revenge.

If the Syrian president loses control over the Republican Guard, civil war could break out between the various claimants to succession, including Assad's brother Rifat, his son Bashar, and various generals and heads of intelligence agencies. In addition, the Sunni Moslem majority in Syria could use the chaos of such a conflict to attempt to overthrow the rule of the Alawite minority, which holds the key positions and uses them to increase its

While the IDF must be prepared for a surprise Syrian attack, the prospect does not seem very likely the 21st century, Syria is still firmly anchored in the 1940s (or perhaps much earlier). Its businesses and population are isolated from the rest of the world, and the longer they wait, the higher the cost of integration.

Another war with Israel would set them back much further.

POLITICALLY, Assad also has a great deal to lose in a war. The damage that would be caused by Israeli counterattacks against Damascus and the surrounding areas would exacerbate the deep fissures in the already fragile Syrian political and social fabric. Assad's brutality, including the 1982 massacre of thousands of Moslem Brotherhood members in Hama, has left many enemies waiting for the opportunity wealth. The visit of Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov to Damascus this week only served to remind Assad of how much the Syrians lost with the end of the Cold War. Primakov may talk a good game, but he cannot provide the massive arms and resupply convoys that the Soviet Union sent during and after the wars in 1967, 1973, and 1982. Primakov and Assad are dinosaurs left over from the Cold War, and there is little they can do other than talk about the "old days." Assad still needs the economic resources of the West, and an attack on Israel will not help him obtain them.

Syria's strategic capabilities have declined in other ways as well. In addition to worrying about Israel, Assad now worries about a possible conflict with Turkey. In addition to territorial disputes and differences over water supplies, the government in Ankara accuses Syria of providing support for terror attacks in Turkey, and its ballistic missiles and chemical weapons are seen as a major threat. Turkey's security would be threatened by a more powerful Syria, and to prevent this, strategic cooperation between Israel and Turkey has grown steadily.

And then, there is Assad's continuing Lebanese problem. If the Syrian leader can claim one success to show for his years in power, it is the consolidation of Syrian hegemony in Lebanon. Syrian troops are well entrenched, and in Beirut, the previously open and lively society is being reduced to a satellite of Damascus.

But Syrian influence is fragile, as illustrated by US Secretary of State Madeleine Albright's recent official visit to Beirut, which Assad tried and failed to prevent. A war with Israel would force the Syrians to withdraw some or all of their forces from Lebanon, providing the Lebanese with an opportunity to break free.

These factors all mitigate against a Syrian military adventure now. Even under the optimal conditions (for Assad), the prospects of achieving anything are close to zero, and the costs are sure to be very high.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ILL-FOUNDED REVIEW

Sir, - Mr. Daniel Ben-Yaakov's review in last week's Magazine of Ambassador Moshe Yegar's book Neutral Policy. Theory versus Practice: Swedish-Israeli Relations saddened me greatly. Even though much could be said about the book and its contents, fortunately the review does not mirror the content of the book.

Usually one should not take seriously so ill-founded accusations as the ones by Mr. Ben-Yaakov. But standing alone Mr. Ben-Yaakov's assault could, in the eyes of an Israeli public that does not regularly follow these matters, harm the true image of Sweden.

For those who concern themselves with Sweden and Swedish policy on the Middle East the article would appear an absurdity. The article does not reflect Swedish-Israeli relations, neither today, nor in the '60s, '70s and '80s. Suffice it to say that our relations are much deeper, more complex and elaborate in real life. The Swedish and Israeli Labor Parties have had close links over the years. To imply that the Labor Party would even consider having contacts with a party with Nazi sympathies is absurd. The Swedish Social Democratic Party played a constructive and positive role when the State of Israel was born. Mr. Ben-Yaakov's accusations are therefore as grave and irrelevant as if they had been pointed at the Israeli Labor Party.

Mr. Ben-Yaakov's onslaught is out of proportion, proves his lack of knowledge of history and is littered with petty mistakes. Names, genders and positions of Swedish politicians have been mixed revealing the author's ignorance of facts.

JOHN HM HAGARD, Ambassador of Sweden, Tel Aviv.

RESPECT FOR ALL PEOPLE

Sir, - Marilyn Henry's article "Yale sued for violating Jewish beliefs" (October 17) raised very important issues that reach far beyond the Gothic walls and spires of Yale University. If the basis of these students' case is that the current housing policy violates their right of free speech and of equal protection under the law, would they be willing to extend such rights to others at Yale and beyond? Will these students and their supporters who are accusing Yale of being inflexible, intolerant, and insensitive to their

Orthodox Jewish beliefs, stand up for my right as an Israeli Jew to practice my non-Orthodox Judaism with full protection of the law? As support builds to discredit Reform and Conservative Jewish practice, Reform facilities are desecrated and Conservative Jews are abused in public. The continued silence of religious and political leaders to speak out in the name of decency, fairness and equality is stunning. As the "Yale Five" go to court in the name of these principals, SOOEE! Out there in fashionable Wendell, North Carolina, Robey Morgan gave President Clinton a holler - at the latter's request. Morgan said his phone rang so many times after he won the National Hollerin' Contest that he had to unplug it. Good thing he turned it back on. It rang, he answered and a voice told him the President of the United States wanted to talk to him. "I thought they were kidding," the 82-year-old hollerin' champ said.

The president requested a command performance. Morgan obliged by doing what he called a good morning or evening holler that neighbors once used to greet each other. Then he gave Clinton a choice of songs he could holler, and the president chose "Amazing Grace." The call lasted 10 to 15 minutes, and Morgan said he won't forget it. AS WE'RE a little short of bona fide philosophers these days, this sort of stuff, antigravity coun-

What do you do when you see an endangered animal that is eating an endangered plant? Would a fly without wings be called a walk? Why do they lock gas station bathrooms? Are they afraid someone will clean them? If the funeral procession is at

UK: Don't rule out attack on Iraq

LONDON (Reuters) - Britain said yesterday military action against Iraq could not be ruled out if Baghdad refuses to comply with United Nations weapons inspections.

"The rest of the world cannot sit by idly while Iraq develops its weapons of mass destruction," Junior Foreign Office Minister Derek Fatchett told BBC television.

"The response will be serious. It will be commensurate with the action," he said. Asked whether a military response is possible, Fatchett said: "We're not ruling out any options at this stage."

"We have to be tough. We have to continue our message. We are very determined in what we are saying and we are not going to allow Iraq to arm itself again," he said.

Fatchett spoke one day after the UN Security Council condemned Iraq's decision to bar Americans from UN weapons inspection teams. The teams were sent in after the 1991 Gulf War to rid Iraq of weapons of mass destruction, a key condition for lifting wide-ranging sanctions imposed after its August 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Iraq had given 10 Americans among about 100 UN arms personnel a week to leave, as from yesterday morning, saying the inspection teams had become an instrument of Washington policy.

In reaction, the UN special commission (UNSCOM) immediately suspended all field operations.

The security council statement was drafted by Britain - a key force in the Gulf War - to demonstrate that all 15 members are united when confronted with a blunt Iraq challenge.

"We will expect Iraq to respond positively to this resolution," said Fatchett, who specializes in Middle Eastern affairs. "We are saying to Iraq that all possible options will be considered to be used against them if in fact Iraq doesn't respond." The tough UN talk caused some jitters, with oil prices rising on the renewed tension and China urging both sides to keep their cool.

"We call on the parties concerned to exercise restraint, and to avoid intensifying the conflict," a Foreign Ministry spokesman said in Beijing yesterday.

The UN resolution said the council was "determined to ensure rapid and full Iraqi compliance with the relevant resolutions and for that purpose will remain actively seized of the matter."

The Baghdad media praised Iraq's gamble but reserved its toughest attacks for the United States, which led the allied bombardment against Iraq six years ago.

A common queen

At 1.8 billion strong, it might be the biggest Anglo-Saxon community in the world.

Or it might be merely a cozy London club for 54 government leaders and hangers-on who fawn on royalty and enjoy expensive trips to inconsequential conferences at interesting venues - like Edinburgh this week.

The Commonwealth, in semantically incorrect days of yore, was known as the British Commonwealth of Nations. Before that it was simply known as The Empire.

It is not to be confused with the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) - an upstart imitation hardly anyone ever hears of any more. That was founded in 1991 by 12 remnants of the Soviet empire.

It comes as something of a surprise to be reminded that 15 members of the (British) Commonwealth still do not have a domestic head of state. They accept the head of the rickety House of Windsor as their monarch - and retain governors general. They include big ones like Australia, Canada, and New Zealand, and little ones like Jamaica, Bahamas, and Solomon Islands.

than a common language encompassing diverse cultures. It tends to be less pompous about this than the snooty Francophone league, and is more down to earth with valuable cultural and educational programs.

The more serious coverage of this year's biennial conference (even in the US), which featured some diverse and interesting views on the global economy and trade, probably resulted from media interest in the jazzy, glitzy opening ceremonies. These were hosted not so much by Queen Elizabeth, the head of the Commonwealth, as by her jazzy, glitzy, new superstar prime minister, Tony Blair.

The queen's Britain is that of happy retainers, who know their place, in their thatched cottages, set in rolling green hills. The Guard changes, men in skirts play bagpipes, others dress in "pink" and chase foxes through the mist on Irish horses, leading packs of vicious hounds. The background music is "Greensleeves" and "God Save the Queen."

Noblesse CDs

No wonder Her Majesty, dressed in the imperial yellow of a Mandarin court, looked confused. Blair had dumped all ye olde English tea shoppe snuff and rolled out a video extravaganza rather archly named www.young.country@britain.gov.uk rather archly named queen@show.looked.distinctly.unamused@the.synthesizer.version.of.the.national.anthem. At least it wasn't re-named Blair Saved the Queen in commemoration of the royals' Diana debacle.

Common what?

The British once ruled more states than are current Commonwealth members, and there are some notable ex-colonial Anglo-Saxon party-poopers. There's the huffy republican next-door neighbor, Ireland ("Join that lot? Give us a break!"), and the United States ("What's the Commonwealth?").

But there were a couple of wannabe applications before this week's Commonwealth summit - Yemen and, inevitably, the Palestinians. They, of course, would join the International Confederation of Cat Fanciers if only it would recognize the State of Palestine, with Jer-mews-alem as its capital, under the sole leadership of Yasser yadda yadda...

Both were rejected - Yemen has a dubious democracy, but that has been no bar to some other dubious Commonwealthers. The Palestinians were told to come back when they have a real rather than a virtual state. No one in the secretariat is holding his breath.

To be fair to what is in concept a pointless organization, the Commonwealth in conference this year was at least worth writing a column about. It made some sensible decisions, allocated a not insubstantial sum of hard cash to help its poorer members, and upheld its dignity by declining to seat the equally obnoxious regimes of Nigeria and Sierra Leone.

Blair flair

If the Commonwealth represents the philosophy of nation shall speak unto nation, then why knock it? There are worse things

To a background of Microsoft graphics and whirling CD-ROMs, Blair said: "As you see, this is a time of renewal and redefinition - for Britain and, I believe, for the Commonwealth. The Britain of the elite is over."

The elite remained seated behind him in a yellow suit. She said, recently: "The modern world is moving too fast for some of the people on it," and some African heads of state, whose countries lack a single computer, much less a phone line to plug it into, must have heartily agreed.

The giant video display did feature some fast-cut clips of the queen's half-century of trips to strange Commonwealth lands, where she watched even more exotic tribal ceremonies than britain-dot-com.

"My goodness, I have been busy," she quipped as she rose to speak.

The roars of laughter and loud applause from the delegates had a genuine ring of relief for this familiarity. Noblesse may still have some oblige.

There will be no www.commonwealth for them yet. The queen and her world is still the one they nostalgically understand from those rosy days of faded imperial simplicity.

Arab League turns down UK offer on Lockerbie

CAIRO (Reuters) - Arab League Secretary-General Esmat Abdel-Maguid has said there would be no point in sending Arab and African observers to a possible trial in Scotland of two Libyans indicted for the 1988 Lockerbie airliner bombing.

"Attendance of Arab and African observers at the trial... will not be useful because they do not have the power to remark on the procedures and progress of the trial," the Egyptian news agency MENA quoted him as saying on Wednesday.

British Foreign Secretary Robin Cook told parliament on Tuesday he was asking UN Secretary

General Kofi Annan, Abdel-Maguid and his counterpart in the Organization for African Unity to send teams to see the Scottish legal system in action in the hope of breaking a deadlock preventing the trial.

Cook said the teams could meet Scottish legal experts and examine the facilities and procedures for the trial, as well as arrangements for international observers to attend it.

Abdel-Maguid said the Arab League supported Libya's offer to let the suspects stand trial in a neutral country, said MENA, monitored by the BBC.

Britain and the United States say the two Libyans were behind the bombing of Pan Am flight 103, in which 270 people died, many of them Americans.

The United Nations imposed sanctions on Libya in 1992 for refusing to extradite the pair to face trial in Britain or the United States. Libya says they would not get a fair trial in either country, proposing that they be tried on neutral ground.

Libyan leader Muammar Gaddafi reiterated his refusal to hand over the two men after meeting South African President Nelson Mandela in the Libyan coastal town of Zuwarah on Wednesday.

Niger to US: Stop meddling

NIAMEY (Reuters) - Niger has told the United States to stop meddling in its internal affairs after the State Department called for an "immediate restoration of a civil and democratic government" in the West African country.

A government statement said Niger would conduct its democratic process at a pace wanted by its people, in conformity with national realities and its identity and basic aspirations.

"The government of Niger reminds the American government that the people of Niger will not accept lessons, advice or more particularly the dictate of a foreign power on the way it conducts its democratic process," the statement added.

The dispute was triggered by implementation of a tough new press law under which a journalist and the head of the West African nation's human rights league have been jailed.

A US statement, issued in Washington on Tuesday, condemned the jailing of journalist Moussa Tchangari of the independent Alternative daily and of human rights league president Bagnou Bonkoukou last Wednesday.

Tchangari was sentenced to three months in jail a month ago on charges of publishing official documents, while Bonkoukou was handed a two-year term last week on charges of insulting President Ibrahim Bare Maïnassara in a newspaper.

The US suspended cooperation with Niger following the controversial election as president in July 1996 of Maïnassara, a former general who toppled a civilian government in a coup six months earlier.

The former army chief scrapped an independent national election commission part-way through polling and set up a replacement which declared him winner of the election.

British nanny jury rehears evidence

By LESLIE GEWIRTZ

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (Reuters) - The Massachusetts jury deciding the fate of a British air pair charged with murdering a baby left in her care reviewed medical testimony on its third day of deliberations yesterday.

They wanted to go over what the brain surgeon who operated on Matthew Eappen said he saw when he punctured the dura, or brain covering, of the 9-month old baby.

Fluid spurted from the infant's brain, soaking neurosurgeon Joseph Madsen, a prosecution witness in the case of Louise Woodward, the 19-year old from the village of Eton near Chester in England, who is charged with murder.

It was the color of that brain fluid that particularly interested the nine women and three men on the jury.

Under cross-examination, Madsen had said the fluid had a clearish color like serum. Serum, jurors were told, would be a sign of an older injury that was healing.

least two weeks old. The jury wanted to hear his statements regarding serum. But Middlesex County Superior Court Judge Hiller Zobel told the jury that a transcript was unavailable.

Leestma was one of several high-priced witnesses, some of whom received up to $900 an hour for the testimony in court, that the defense put on the stand. E.F. Au Pair, the agency that brought Woodward over, is paying her legal bills.

As the wait for a verdict continued, the press corps grew to at least 80 with networks from both sides of the Atlantic sending crews to the courthouse in Cambridge.

Boston newspapers and television stations have sent reporters to Woodward's home village and British media have fanned out through Cambridge and Newton, where the Eappens live.

Prosecutors contend that Woodward was frustrated and angry and violently shook Matthew, then slammed his head against a hard surface to get him to stop crying.

The jurors must decide one of three possible verdicts: guilty of first- or second-degree murder, or acquittal.

The difference between first-degree and second-degree murder in Massachusetts rests on the phrase "extreme atrocity and cruelty." First-degree murder brings a mandatory sentence of life in prison without parole. In second-degree murder, the penalty is life, but parole is possible after 15 years.

Two years later: Where is the Left?

Meretz party functionary Rami Sadeh, the secretary of the Peace Movements Coordinating Committee, expects 100,000 people at next Saturday's rally in Yitzhak Rabin Square to mark the second anniversary of the prime minister's assassination.

But, according to Sadeh, the real powers in the committee are the Labor Party, Meretz, Peace Now and Dor Shalem Dorsh Shalom, the movement headed by Yitzhak Rabin's son Yuval.

Activists believe that after two years of paralyzing despair following Rabin's murder, the peace camp will reawaken with a mass rally in Tel Aviv. But as Dan Izenberg writes, planning the event has exposed tensions within the camps.

Aviad believes that over the past two months, Peace Now has turned a corner. "For four years we thought we were building peace at the grass-roots level," said Aviad, referring to the years of the Rabin-Peace Now government.

It reminds me of my generation. According to Aviad, the strength of Peace Now is in the clarity of its message. It stands for two independent states, including a Palestinian state.

Peace Now's principles are violated by the government, they should come out and demonstrate. It is also the clarity of its platform and its organizational tactics that distinguishes Peace Now from other groups.

Incrementalism, grass-roots change over many years, moderation and consensus are the key words in the Dor Shalem lexicon. The movement links right-wing radicalism, religious fundamentalism and militant nationalism to irrational thinking.

Yehi-Shalom takes pride in the fact that Dor Shalem maintains a dialogue with the settlers, and has held meetings with Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon and Foreign Minister David Levy.

'We must move towards peace by adopting a responsible program - like the one Rabin started. If we foment polarization, we could undermine our goals.'

agree that joint activity should be limited to major events - like the anniversary of Rabin's murder or the anniversary of the signing of the first Oslo Accord.

"Since then, there has been a qualitative change in the spirit of the peace camp that indicates to me that a forceful movement is emerging again," said Aviad.

state with territorial contiguity, thus obliging Israel to withdraw major territorial concessions, the removal of Jewish settlements that interfere with this contiguity, and compromise over Jerusalem whereby its religious coercion would be unleashed here.

Meretz, according to Sarid, is "a pragmatic party and it fully realizes that there are times in which certain flags need to be lowered for the sake of political expediency, but we cannot agree that all flags be folded up on Barak's orders and concealed in Labor's dusty dark back rooms."

Meretz's forerunner - never conducted any sort of a dialogue with the religious parties. "Meretz's outspoken anti-religious stance, frankly, hindered Barak's efforts. I suggested to Barak that he seek prior coordination on all his moves with Meretz and the Arab parties, so that there would be no misunderstanding. We need to divide the territory. They can concentrate on getting votes from the Left while we from the center. This way they would let Barak veer rightwards for tactical purposes and not impede him."

Family feud

In calmer days it surely would not have gone unnoticed, but a warning issued this week by Meretz leader Yossi Sarid to Labor Party chairman Ehud Barak seemed to have somehow escaped public attention.

Are Labor and Meretz headed for a divorce? Or is the apparent distance between Ehud Barak and Yossi Sarid just a ploy to win votes for the center? Sarah Honig reports.

right of his party, but he must not take Meretz too much for granted. "He cannot use us for whipping boys. He doesn't like what Netanyahu dishes out to him but he then has no right to turn around and beat up on Meretz. Barak would do well to remember the old saying: 'Don't do unto others what you don't like done to you.'"

WEISS, HOWEVER, claims Sarid and Meretz are feigning naivete. "Barak is trying to get Labor back to power - plain and simple," Weiss said. "In that, he is doing the dirty work not only for Labor but for Meretz as well."

LABOR'S IN-HOUSE political scientist and historian, MK Shevah Weiss, admitted in a conversation with The Jerusalem Post that "for a while things had actually reached a degree of mellowness and even affection on the Left, which the Left had not known before. It wasn't just between Labor and Meretz, but also between Rabin and Shimon Peres."

SARID SEES things differently. "Labor and Meretz served in the same government and we did many great things together and banded for the same cause with the spirit of all for one and one for all. After all which my Meretz colleagues and I did in that government, Barak's behavior these days is cynically ungrateful."

"I recognize that he has his own expedient plans and that the association with Meretz may be something he would like to hide, so I am willing to overlook personal and collective insults, sting though they may. But there are positions to which the entire Left is committed and not all can be erased. I realize that Barak is seeking votes to the hawkish as Rabin did. He has no choice but to be more dovish than Rabin was in 1992."

More than just following in Rabin's footsteps, Barak, according to Weiss, "is reviving the old Mapai. Don't forget that it was Mapai which forged the historic agreement with the NRP, while Mapai - misunderstanding. We need to divide the territory. They can concentrate on getting votes from the Left while we from the center. This way they would let Barak veer rightwards for tactical purposes and not impede him."

Good morning, Lebanon

This year's high casualty toll has generated a raging debate about the wisdom of staying in south Lebanon. Soldiers there, however, seem to have no doubts about their mission. David Rudge reports from an outpost in the security zone.

A boom echoed around the military compound as two IAF warplanes, flying at high altitude, broke the sound barrier above the northern border as they headed into the skies over south Lebanon.

"Good morning, Lebanon," someone shouted, playing on the Hollywood movie of the life and times of American servicemen in Vietnam.

A short while later, an IDF convoy, destined to take troops and supplies to a position inside the security zone, assembled in the compound.

Among the troops waiting to join the convoy was Nathan Levinson, 25, a member of a Merkava tank crew, going to relieve colleagues at an outpost.

Levinson left his home in Florida and came here alone, joining the army at a relatively late age.

Home for him now, when he is on leave, is Kibbutz Ortal on the Golan Heights.

He believes Hizbullah's recent successes in penetrating the armor of the highly rated Merkava Mark II, hits that caused casualties, were simply cases of bad luck.

"If the guys had seen them and they'd had the time, they would have blown the terrorists away," said Levinson.

"The [Merkava] tank is one of the best in the world. Although nothing is impenetrable, we still feel pretty safe and secure inside. We know our job and if something happens we deal with it."

"You know that a few of your buddies have been killed and wounded, but you try not to think about that at all. You can't live or work like that in the army and especially not in a tank - thinking about what might happen if a missile were to hit."

"You focus on the positive things, joke around and be in a good mood and do the best you can. That's pretty well what it comes down to."

Levinson, who has been serving in south Lebanon for several months, maintains the same attitude when speaking to his parents in America.

"They are all right about me being here. They just ask me to be safe and take care of myself. I don't talk to them much about the bad things, just the positive aspects," he said.

The conversation was interrupted by a call to the soldiers and visiting journalists joining the convoy to assemble for a briefing before entering the security zone.

A supply convoy of this type is considered a "soft" target in the guerrilla war being waged primarily by Hizbullah against the IDF and South Lebanese Army. It is relatively slow-moving and exposed to long-range antitank missile fire, roadside explosive devices, car bombs, ambushes and even suicide attacks, depending on the terrain and the area. A convoy carrying soldiers is an even more "attractive" target.

All possible measures, therefore, are taken to ensure safe passage. This usually includes checking the route beforehand for mines or explosive devices and keeping a constant watch for any unusual activity.

There are no absolutes in Lebanon, however, and the adage "always expect the unexpected" is acutely applicable there.

For example, rocks and tree branches lining the roads might be just that. But they also might be hollowed out or made of fiberglass and packed with explosives, as well as metal ball bearings to increase the deadly effects.

Vehicles traveling along the same route or those parked by the side of the road are potential car bombs. Drivers and passengers might be suicide bombers, as could a man leading his donkey.

On this occasion, the convoy consisted of armored personnel carriers and Safari trucks. The lorries still have canvas-covered roofs, but the sides and bottom have been reinforced. The armor plating on the sides is interspersed with porthole-like windows of bullet-proof glass. Some of these had already been splintered in places.

The Safaris used in south Lebanon today are relatively well-protected, although everybody boarding wore flak jackets and helmets, as an added safety measure.

The briefing by the convoy commander, Lt. Raz, dealt with the distances to be kept between the vehicles, and how to react in the various circumstances that might arise, including, if necessary, the evacuation of casualties.

The briefing lasted over 10 minutes. Although the soldiers hear the same comments every time they enter or leave south Lebanon, they nevertheless listened attentively before going to their assigned tasks.

The conversation aboard our truck was desultory. Perhaps it was because of the harsh and grindlog noise of the engine straining up the loog, steep, winding road to the outpost, though it may have been for other reasons.

"I'm what you could call a combat driver who drives in certain circumstances that other drivers in the army don't have to face," said Gital Barak, 20, from Haifa, who regularly goes into the security zone.

"A fool will tell you he is not afraid or not worried, but it is something you have to do. It's out an option."

"You have to be alert and look at the faces of people on the road and guess their next move. A suicide bomber is not generally calm. He would look worried and sweaty. You have to look for the signs."

"I always look to the side of the truck for any suspicious stones or rocks and I always look around when I come to a curve because that's the point where the terrorists are likely to try and fire missiles," said Barak, after reaching the outpost.

THIS outpost is not on the "front line" - the term used to describe those positions along the northern edge of the security zone.

It is situated on a ridge overlooking the Litani River, seen glinting dimly below, as it winds its way between the hills until it joins with Wadi Safuki - the scene of many recent clashes.

Birds of prey were hovering above the river at the time, tiny dots impossible to identify properly with the naked eye. The scene was pastoral, even breath-takingly beautiful. The topography, however, is ideally suited for guerrilla warfare. The hills, wadis, rocks, bushes and trees provide an abundance of cover for gunmen.

On the Ali Tahr hill range directly opposite, on the other side of the Litani River valley, lies the village of Yochmour, with the IDF-held Beaufort Castle and adjacent Arnoun village nearby.

Yochmour and Arnoun are both "hostile" villages. No vehicles are allowed to travel inside Arnoun because of the potential threat to IDF convoys traveling up to the Beaufort. Yochmour has been used on many occasions by Hizbullah for firing and launching attacks at IDF and SLA targets in the zone.

Slightly to the south is Taibeh and more hostile areas; northwards the villages of Zarta al-Sharika and Zarta al-Arbiyeh, the market town of Nabatiya and other areas considered to be Hizbullah strongholds.

Behind the outpost lies Merulla, Kiryat Shmona and other northern communities, some of which can be seen from the ramparts.

The position has come under fire in the past. The outpost itself is dominated by the central bunker, a pyramid of stone blocks piled on top of one another to protect the soldiers' barracks inside.

The outpost is surrounded by ramparts reached by stairs, on the top of which are reinforced observation posts and firing points for light artillery, mortars and heavy machine guns. A tank and APCs are there to give support if necessary.

An alert exercise was conducted during the day. The speed with which the troops donned their own protective gear and battle pouches and, armed with weapons, raced to their appointed posts, indicated that this was something they had done - for practice and under fire - many times.

ON THIS occasion, the troops manning the outpost are members of the Golan Brigade, assisted by armored corps and ancillary personnel. The first thing one notices is that all of them, including the officers, are young.

Sec.-Lt. Amit, 21, is in charge of the position. It is a big responsibility, but he knows what he is doing and why he is there.

"I'm from Kiryat Shmona. Since childhood, I have seen the bombs and the Katyusha rockets. My being here is like completing the circle, because now I am helping to defend the northern communities," said Amit, whose father served in Lebanon before him.

The calls by some members of the public for unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon don't faze him.

"I can't blame the parents because there is nothing more painful than losing a child," said Amit. "I understand them and I don't think that they are saying these things against us, because inside, I'm sure, they all know the importance of us being here."

"In my opinion, it is preferable that it be us, the soldiers in uniform and with arms [that are hit] and not residents sitting quietly in their homes. At least they can be certain that nobody will attack them," he said.

The guerrilla war being waged in south Lebanon, however, does not make life easy for the soldiers. Amit noted that Hizbullah often fires from inside villages or on the outskirts of them, knowing the IDF would not retaliate for fear of harming innocent civilians. If it did and civilians were hurt, Hizbullah could then use the casualties as a pretext for Katyusha rocket attacks on the North, as it has done many times in the past.

SELF-DEFENSE, in the case of south Lebanon, often means not waiting for Hizbullah to come to you, but going out to meet them first.

Ro'i, 23, also started late in the army after returning to Israel from Boston, where his parents had moved several years ago and where they still live. He now lives in Bat Yam. He is one of the Negev machine-gunners in the unit.

Patrols and ambush operations in the field, often late at night, are aimed at trying to hit Hizbullah before it can carry out attacks.

"I believe in God and I'm certainly not scared to be here. The commanders are good and I trust them, as well as my comrades. We trained a lot before we came here. After a while you get tired of all the training and want to do the real thing," said Ro'i.

"I like to go out on ambushes, although unfortunately it's not that often that you are lucky enough to encounter Hizbullah. I still hope we will get our chance," said Ro'i.

Like Amit, he is convinced of the importance of the army's presence in the security zone despite the setbacks and the casualties. Ro'i stressed that the army is making a great effort to better protect the positions and improve the amenities.

"The food is excellent and there are no problems with the water supplies," he said. "I saw pictures of what this position used to look like before. It was all bare, but now we have a lot of protected places and we feel secure."

"Some people have compared the situation in south Lebanon to that of the Americans in Vietnam. 'I studied Vietnam when I lived in America and there is no comparison,' said Ro'i. 'We are not doing the job here for political reasons but because we have to. We are defending the northern communities, our own people, and stopping infiltrations into Israel, and we are winning.'"

Could an international force do the job as well as, if not better than, the IDF?

"I don't think so," Ro'i said. "They would not have the same motivation. If international troops were here and one of their positions was attacked, I'm sure they would just flee and then there would be nobody here to stop the terrorists."

WITH THE food, field rations and other equipment unloaded and the fresh troops having replaced those going on leave, the convoy was ready for the journey back.

Among those returning was David Stark, 21, who was headed home to Ma'aleh Adumim, to be with his family who immigrated from Los Angeles in 1994.

"I hope we will be on leave for a week," said Stark, a Merkava tank driver, who is on his third tour of duty in south Lebanon.

The sound of outgoing artillery fire echoed in the distance as the truck made its slow descent towards the international border. The firing might have been merely a weapons verification check - or something else. In south Lebanon it's not always possible to know for sure unless something happens close by.

"The situation here is not that of a continuous war, 24 hours a day and seven days a week. Nevertheless, you always try to maintain awareness as much as possible and be ready for whatever happens, because there's always the knowledge that something could happen," said Stark.

"Until it does happen, however, you don't think about things too much and then when finally it does, you react as you have been trained."

How are his parents handling his service?

"My mother is worried, but my dad handles it better. I don't really talk with them too much about the situation here."

"From the point of view of being here and stopping infiltrations, we are doing the job to the best of our ability and the results in that respect are pretty good."

"The fact that this has been a hard year for the IDF, which has taken a lot of hits recently, is the price that has to be paid. If you ask me, however, it's a worthwhile cause to protect the people living along the northern border," he added, shortly before the truck came to a stop, safely back in Israel.

The Moshe Dayan Center Seminar: Leaders of the Middle East

In the Middle East surrounding Israel, political longevity is the rule. Most of the region's Kings and presidents have held power for a generation or more. Who are these men? How have they managed to withstand so many challenges, how have they evaded assassination and accountability? Are the new faces among them really all that new? And can they control destinies for much longer? These are crucial questions not only for those who live under these leaders, but for their neighbors, including Israel. This seminar will bring together Israel's outstanding Middle East experts, to paint a series of detailed portraits of the handful of people who rule the Middle East today.

The clash: Israeli and Palestinian protesters demonstrate at Jerusalem's Ras al-Amud in mid-September, as border police guard the compound. (AP)

Inside Ras al-Amud

Only six weeks after the bedlam, life has become routine for the 10 young men living in this controversial building. Eili Wohlgeherter, the first journalist allowed into the compound since they moved in, reports on the quiet after the storm.

Ras al-Amud six weeks later: 'It's become very quiet.... The Arabs are getting used to the fact that we're here.' (Debbie Hill)

Forget about the police, forget the demonstrations for and against, the 24-hour protest tents, the swarm of media people camped outside waiting for something to happen. Six weeks after 10 young men moved into the controversial building owned by Irving Moskowitz in Jerusalem's Ras al-Amud, Jewish life goes on there without any trace of the bedlam that erupted after three families moved in late one night in mid-September. Except for the policemen stationed right near the house, there is no indication that the property was recently at the epicenter of international political debate. The first visit, inside the compound by a journalist, since the young men moved in reveals that the house has undergone substantial renovations. But what impresses a visitor most is the absolute quiet surrounding the house, and the seemingly normal lives the tenants are leading. "It's become very quiet, thank God," said 25-year-old Michael, as he sat in the succa, eating a chicken lunch one afternoon last week. "Slowly, slowly, it's quieted down. The Arabs are getting used to the fact that we're here. "We're also getting used to it. We buy stuff at their corner grocery, we say 'good morning, good afternoon' - we're trying to relate well with everyone. "They know who we are. What will be? We don't know what will be. That's how it is now."

Each member of the group takes turns keeping watch on the roof and in front of the house, where there are also private security guards. Near the wall surrounding the property sits a police jeep; two other security personnel sit at the edge of the property across the street, overlooking Silwan. It is the security presence that most irks the Arab neighbors. "We can't live normally here; it's very difficult because the police and Border Police are here all the time," said Birkan Fuaz, sitting in a car at the corner talking with a friend. "They don't allow us to move around in our village freely, you understand? All the time they ask us for our identity cards, our car papers, [and] search us - how can we live with them?" He said that the Jewish tenants don't acknowledge him when they walk by on the street. "They look at you like you're a terrorist, I can see it in their eyes," he said. From the time he was born in 1971, Fuaz said, all he heard was bow the Jews had taken over Palestinian land in the 1967 war. "The Jews are like a disease, they enter into neighborhood and take over one house, then after a month or two they take over another house, and more land, and more land," he said calmly. "This is our land, and I understand only one thing: What they took, they took with force, but the day will come when we will take it back with force. Only in a war - we won't get it back with talk, with peace. There will never be a Palestinian state for us if we don't make war." Fuaz also wanted to share a history lesson about the neighborhood: The Mount of Olives cemetery, he said, was land rented by the Jews from the Wakf 99 years ago. "It wasn't rented as a cemetery, but they came and made it a cemetery, so that this land would remain theirs. Why? After the lease is up, we'll tell them 'take your dead bodies, we want the land back?' You can't do that. "See how the Jews think? It's true they're smart, but we're smarter than them." At the corner grocery, Ahmed Mohammed said the Jews come into his shop around twice a week, and are always friendly and polite. "They speak cordially, we speak cordially to them," he said. "They buy and leave, we say 'Shalom, shalom, good morning, have a good day.' We're here to sell, how else should we talk?" But he won't extend them credit, a common neighborhood courtesy. "I don't know them," Mohammed said. "I give credit to people whom I know independently - a friend of mine, my nephew. If I don't know them, how can I give them credit? If they leave, how can I find them? The police are going to get him and bring him here?" "No, An Arab, I know where he lives, I know his brother, I know his father - so if he leaves, I know where to go for the money." He said the neighbors are still angry over the way the building was moved into, because "this wasn't done in a proper fashion. If they had done it in a proper way, then they would be considered neighbors, like all neighbors." Mohammed also complained that the security presence disrupts the neighborhood's day-to-day life, adding if the students' presence were truly normal, "there wouldn't be police here sitting with them and guarding them; they wouldn't have to have protection 24 hours a day." WITH THE world media now ignoring the Moskowitz building, it's become just another quasi-dormitory for post-army bachelors. "For me it's not a political issue," said Ami, a yeshiva student. "I live in this house and that's it. We don't see ourselves as political emissaries at all. "I don't relate to all the political stuff - what the prime minister has said or hasn't, a compromise or no compromise - it's a place to live so I live here." The issue for the young men, it seems, is not so much how the Arabs feel, but how their fellow Jews feel. Many people, they say, have stopped by to show their support, from the Golan Heights to Eilat, both religious and secular. Secular? "I'll tell you a story," said Michael. "I was someplace in Jerusalem asking for a donation. The landlord, a secular man, said to us: 'The truth is, I don't really identify with what you're doing.' "I said to him, 'You know, there could be a difference of opinion over the expression it's taking, but since we're here already, don't you agree with me that it's Jerusalem, and Jerusalem is above everything else?' and he said to me, 'You know, you're right.' And he gave me a lot of money, a great deal indeed." Because of all the support, the tenants don't feel isolated. "I don't feel alone," said Michael. "I can see the Jewish Quarter, and 25 meters from here is the Sephardi graveyard of the Mount of Olives. That means that since people are buried here, people come here [to visit them] - 100 meters below are the houses of the City of David, and there's a way to walk down there." The Western Wall, he said, is less than 15 minutes away. Because of the 10-man limit imposed by the compromise, they only bring an overnight guest when someone goes away for a Shabbat. But except for that restriction, "Normal life resumed after the hectic first two weeks," Michael said. "Someone who has a girlfriend goes to visit her, someone who studies goes to the university, someone else at a yeshiva goes to the yeshiva. We're normal people, leading totally normal lives."

THE "Ras al-Amud 10" - all between 24 and 26 years old, wearing the knitted kippot of the national-religious camp - are living there as part of the compromise agreement worked out between the government and Moskowitz, the Miami millionaire who owns the building. Under the agreement, the three families moved out and were replaced with the young men. Some members of the group work, others study at yeshiva or at the Hebrew University. According to Michael - who refused to give his last name - one tenant, who has direct contact with Moskowitz, formally rented the house from him, with three others signing the lease. "We all pay rent, everyone joins in paying water, phone, electricity - whatever is used. We work it out between ourselves, like anybody sharing an apartment." The flag flying on the roof marks the house from a distance. On the door - and around the house - are a dozen "Jerusalem is ours" stickers. Inside the house, rooms that were in disrepair a month ago have been cleaned up. One large room has been divided into two smaller rooms and been painted, and an office has been built inside the adjoining garage. Walls have been plastered and electricity installed. Outside, the backyard has been cleared of all debris, and the earth looks fresh for planting. There are new rings of barbed wire ready to be put up atop the outside wall, and floor tiles piled alongside the building waiting to be laid down. Almost all of the work is being done by the tenants themselves. "There was one person who's a professional and he showed the rest of us what to do," said Michael. "But many among us also have 'good hands,' so they didn't have a problem. There was an electrician, too, who volunteered his services, and also a plumber who came without charging, but overall, the work was

Stock shock across the globe: From New York's Wall Street (left) to Hong Kong, traders expressed acute anxiety as they reviewed the sharp fluctuation in stock prices earlier this week. (AP)

All the world's a trade

This week's global financial turmoil has demonstrated the extent to which the world has adopted the open market system of the West, writes James Flanigan

The astounding worldwide stock market turmoil of the past week signals a watershed in global economic development. It is a demand by global investors that all countries adapt their economies to the dictates of open markets.

Just as the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 marked the triumph of the American political system over communism, so the latest crisis marks the triumph of the Western economic system of open markets over state-run economies.

Open market principles insist that countries such as China loosen state controls over industry and investment and allow international investors, in some real way, to be arbiters of its economic policies.

Indeed, it was international investor suspicion that stock prices of China's state-owned companies were inflated that led to the market crisis of the last week.

The crisis began in Hong Kong where investors saw the stock exchange increasingly introducing shares in Chinese companies that were not businesses in any traditional sense of the word. Rather, these so-called Red Chip companies were corporate shells designed to raise capital through Hong Kong so that the Beijing government could inject assets into state-owned corporations and give them the appearance of private companies.

They were popular with investors with the approach of the July handover of Hong Kong to Chinese control, and such Red Chips quickly rose to a market value of $60 billion. But now Red Chips have tumbled in value along with other shares on Hong Kong's market.

It was the most dramatic demonstration yet of the new power of global market investors to dictate terms to ostensibly powerful governments. But it wasn't the only recent case of investor revolt.

Smaller nations, notably Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines, in July felt the lash of open market pressure. Global investors, in effect, objected to the way those countries took in the world's investments in their infant stock markets and then poured the funds into grandiose state projects or real estate developments of dubious economic value.

"This crisis will one day be seen as a milestone in the evolution of a truly global capital market," said Jeffrey Garten, dean of the Yale School of Management and a former US undersecretary of commerce.

"Markets can be great levelers," Garten adds. "They say to every country, if you want the world's money, we want investments that are reasonable, open, transparent and producing real returns."

That model of open companies, reporting to shareholders, making decisions on sound economic principles rather than national favoritism or because the project's developer is the brother-in-law of a government official, is one that the United States has long championed and largely lived by. Its opposition in recent decades has come from the so-called Asian model of Japanese companies. They operated behind a wall of trade and investment restrictions to take advantage of access to open markets in the United States and other countries. But they do so without letting US companies enjoy access to its huge markets.

US policy has fought for years to open up Japan's system, and that battle is finally achieving some success.

Japan has been forced by seven years of recession and continual international pressure to begin opening its financial system to foreign competition and to the free-market rule that investments earn a return.

But China presented a new and even larger Asian model. China's policy — announced in September by President Jiang Zemin, who met President Clinton in Washington this week — was to create 1,000 large state-owned companies. Some of them, Chinese officials declared, would qualify for the Fortune 500.

But they wouldn't be like IBM or other companies on that list of the largest corporations. If IBM wishes to raise money from stock investors it must issue a detailed prospectus explaining what it is going to do with the funds and how it plans to earn a return on investment. And government regulators must verify the claims in the prospectus.

China's companies, state-controlled in a system that does not believe in full disclosure, would not have to go through such explanations.

Rather, say numerous Western business negotiators in China, officials there seem to think the world's capital should be forthcoming simply because they want to build their planned infrastructure projects.

This crisis has come about because the world's investors have declared such terms unacceptable. The markets' challenge to state economies has been met with howls of protest.

Malaysia's ruler, Mahathir Mohammed, and others in Asia have charged that their currency devaluations were forced by a conspiracy of speculators. But the pension funds and mutual funds of the world are not speculators. By and large they are patient investors seeking to earn returns with which to pay pensions and social benefits to their clients.

The pension and mutual funds, now grown to trillions of dollars in size, represent something relatively new in the world. Each day enormous sums whirl across the globe ceaselessly investing in currencies, stocks and bonds of every nation.

Ultimately, those investment ultimately determine everything from the interest rate on your mortgage to the employment of a nation's workers and the living standards of its citizens.

To be sure, Malaysia, Thailand and other countries might well be genuinely puzzled by the workings of those investment flows. After all, Thailand and Malaysia scarcely had a stock market 10 years ago.

Investment capital in developing countries was allocated by the central state government or, as in most cases, it didn't exist at all.

But the global spread of technology, which has given workers in developing countries training to work on sophisticated machines making products for the world markets, has changed all that.

All of a sudden, ancient societies became involved in the global markets for goods and services, and global markets for capital.

The new money pushed up living standards very fast, making people believe they had discovered a new way to mine gold.

But in this crisis, those new nations in the world economy are learning that access to global capital carries with it rules and responsibilities — to use the capital efficiently and in ways that produce a return for investors.

Yet developing countries are not the only ones being taught lessons in this crisis. France, and other countries of Europe, have suffered economic setbacks because their customers in Asia have had to devalue their currencies and throttle back their economies.

According to Joanne Peraz, Paris-based economist for Merrill Lynch, "Europe has built its whole recovery scenario on exports. A lot of the potential European export markets are at risk."

now seem to be recovering in concert, testify to that interconnectedness.

Indeed, the United States, too, can anticipate fallout from the crisis. Many economic experts are predicting that the low wage countries of Asia, their costs reduced even further by currency devaluations, will now try to regain economic health by pouring out exports to the big and open US market.

It's not news that the US economy endures competitive pressures because it does largely play by the free market rules of free trade and open disclosure. But in the world economy emerging for the 21st century, the spread of open markets will support US interests which lie with a world where investments earn real returns and trade can be on rational terms.

Japan discovered the value of open markets when its financial system failed to produce the investment gains needed for pensions for its aging population. That's why Japan is deregulating that financial system today, opening it to participation by US and other foreign companies.

"The hope is to raise the average return on pension investments," said Eisuke Sakakibara, vice minister of finance, at a recent World Economic Forum meeting in Hong Kong. (LA Times)

Tel Aviv joins the world

By DAN GERSTENFELD

The dramatic decline of the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange on Tuesday demonstrated once more that the local financial market is no longer isolated from events taking place thousands of miles away on the world's leading trading floors.

The first buds of this phenomenon were evident already in October 1987, when the local market was jolted following Wall Street's crash. This week's experience seemed to have impressed local market players much more deeply.

The initial reaction of the Tel Aviv stock market to Tuesday's 7 percent decline in New York was a sharp fall of 9.86% in the benchmark Mishkanim index, its biggest one-day fall in more than three years.

"You could feel a real panic in the market. This was our welcoming reception to the world markets and we learned for the first time what it means to be caught in a global hysteria," said Michael Weiss, investment manager at Evergreen Capital Markets.

Eli Nahum, head of trading at Zamex Securities, sees the market's reaction to Wall Street's decline as a healthy development. "Once more we got proof that we are part of the global village and I personally felt great knowing that we are also part of all this. I would have felt lousy if all the stock markets abroad fell and we didn't join in. We have to be satisfied knowing that Israel is no longer isolated from what's happening abroad."

With more than 100 Israeli companies now traded abroad, there is a constantly growing correlation between what happens in the trading halls of Rehov Ahad Ha'am and what happens elsewhere in world markets.

The steep increase in foreign investments, seen after the signing of the Oslo Accords in 1993, has contributed to this correlation. The World Bank's decision to include Israel, as of November 1, in the International Financial Corporation's index of emerging markets attests to this change. The inclusion is expected to draw more investments to the TASE as many global funds are obliged to invest in countries represented in the IFC index.

Foreign investors are currently believed to hold about 4% of the stocks traded in the TASE, which represents almost 12% of the free float in the market.

Despite the recent interactivity between the local market and the global markets, analysts believe that in the long term the impact on local investors should be minimal, and the direction of the local market will be dictated by the fundamental economic developments in the Israeli economy.

"The American market is overpriced and the Israeli one is traded at a discount of 10 to 20%," Weiss said. "In the long term the direction of the market will be based only on its economical value."

"All the fundamentals support the continuation of a positive trend. Events in Wall Street affect the market only when something dramatic happens. If nothing of this kind happens abroad the Israeli market will continue to attract investors even if the American market posts a slow decline," Nahum said.

Unfortunately, the globalization process only seems to rear its head when world markets face downturns. Three years ago, as Wall Street started surging, the local market remained listless.

Traders are now hoping that, should Wall Street enter tough times, Israeli markets will avoid that punishment.

"Since we were never invited to the wedding I hope we won't have to attend the funeral," a Tel Aviv trader said.

Considering that the 1929 stock-market crash took place when the weekly Torah portion was Noah, it is quite possible that when newly bankrupt financial dilettantes were jumping off Manhattan skyscrapers, worshippers in nearby synagogues were reading about the flood which nearly wiped out humanity.

when US unemployment soared from 3.2 to 25% - the government failed to reduce the price of money. The dearth of fresh cash, following the failure of numerous banks, resulted in a 27% decline in the amount of money that circulated in the US during the four years that preceded Franklin Roosevelt's presidency.

Finally, investors in the 1920s behaved so naively with their money that they frivolously placed huge chunks of their resources in the stock market - frequently all they had, and often much more than that. For most of them, a hard market crash was not even a theoretical prospect.

the universality and speed with which it struck. Having swept like wildfire through thousands upon thousands of Asian, European, American and Middle Eastern brokers' modems, beepers, and computer screens, this financial El Niño was a global cyber-crash.

Noah's generation - described as "corrupt" and "filled with violence" - echoes of modern promiscuity, nihilism and hedonism. In the Tower-builders, meanwhile, they saw a type of 20th-century fascists who built monumental behemoths as part of a mindframe which challenged God, regimentalized man, and trampled on freedom.

Jew vs. Jew: A historical perspective

As frigid as the Lithuanian winter of 1772 was, it was not as cold as the reception two hassidic rabbis received when they knocked on the door of the Gaon of Vilna. The Gaon, the most venerated rabbinic authority of his time, opened the door and promptly slammed it shut in their faces. When they appeared at his door a second time, the sage slammed it shut again.

That encounter heralded the bitter conflict between hassidism and mitnagdim that would tear apart Eastern European Jewry for decades.

The Jewish people over the millennia has periodically faced the prospect of a permanent split within its ranks. Lasting divisions on a massive scale were somehow avoided, apart from the separation in early biblical times of Israel and Judah into two nations, one of which would disappear. The relative firmness of Jewish unity reflected by this history does not necessarily provide a comforting precedent for the current controversy between the Orthodox on one hand and the Conservative and Reform movements on the other.

In its scale and in the depth of the halachic fault line, the present conflict may be the most dangerous threat to Jewish unity in two millennia. The past conflicts, however, do indicate that seemingly intractable disputes can sometimes turn into something less threatening over time.

During the Second Temple period, the Jews were divided by deep-seated differences into three main groupings — Pharisees,

As the battle rages over 'who is a Jew,' Abraham Rabinovich explores past rifts that threatened the Jewish people, and tries to assess the danger today.

Sadducees, and Essenes. The latter in particular had an ideology and practices that set it far apart. It even had its own calendar, which meant that holidays, including Yom Kippur, were not marked together with the rest of the nation.

While some Jews during that period accepted the conversion of Gentiles into the Jewish fold, notes Prof. Daniel Schwartz of the Hebrew University, others did not. Just as priests were priests by virtue of birth, there were some who felt that if you weren't born a Jew you couldn't be a Jew. Even King Herod, whose grandfather had converted to Judaism, and Herod's grandson, Agrippas I, would be dismissed by some as non-Jews or half-Jews.

It was the destruction of the temple that kept these differences from leading to a permanent split, suggests Schwartz. Both the Sadducees and Essenes were priestly parties and without a temple to serve or the prospect of one, they faded from history. Rabbinic Judaism, unattached to a temple or the notion of personal status deriving from birth, gave the Jews the flexibility to survive during 1,900 years of exile and to easily accept the conversion of Gentiles into its ranks.

The parallel between that period and today is not exact, says

Schwartz. "Back then you had one group believing that the other groups were doing it wrong, but they never denied that the other groups were Jewish. It is different if you have large numbers of people whose Jewishness is not recognized by others."

The Karaites schism, which began in the eighth century CE, likewise involved deep-seated differences but no irredeemable rift. Founded by Anan, a disappointed candidate for the leadership of the Jewish community in Babylonia, the sect shunned the Talmud and any laws derived from it, basing its religious beliefs entirely on interpretation of the Bible. The Karaites, too, followed their own calendar and embraced an asceticism regarded as perverse by mainstream, or Rabbanite, Jews. They did not permit fires to be lit for the Sabbath, for instance, and spent Friday nights in darkness and cold. Initially, the two camps viewed each other as heretic, refused to pray with each other, or to enter into marriage with partners from the other side. The conflict was sometimes violent and may even have included killings.

The Karaites proselytized vigorously among the Jews and soon had strong communities throughout the East and in Europe. Karaites were among the wealthiest and most influential Jews in Egypt. Of the three synagogues in medieval Cairo, one was Karaite. In Jerusalem, as many as half the Jews may have been Karaites.

Gradually, attitudes changed. The Cairo Geniza has produced more than half a dozen marriage contracts between Karaites and Rabbanites in which the two sides pledge to honor the religious practices of the other. (A Karaite wife, for instance, would not be obliged to light Sabbath candles for a Rabbanite husband.) Prof. Haggai Ben-Shammai of Hebrew University notes that this liberal approach changed by the 16th century when both Ashkenazi and Sephardi rabbinical authorities (except in Egypt) maintained that since Karaite divorces were not conducted according to Rabbanite Halacha, there was a chance that the children of women who remarried, and the descendants of those children, would be mamzerim — i.e., religiously illicit offspring and therefore non-marriageable.

The Karaites, for their part, would in time moderate some of their practices and permit themselves light on the Sabbath, even lighting Sabbath candles but without pronouncing a blessing. Parts of Russia were once Karaite bastions. Almost all the Karaites who have come from there in the recent mass immigration have joined the mainstream Jewish community in Israel rather than the small Karaite community that still exists here, notes Ben-Shammai.

The fierceness of the dispute between Hassidim and their opponents that began in the 18th century can be measured by the leading role played by the Vilna Gaon, an ascetic scholar who normally avoided political issues. It was, in fact, the Gaon himself who initiated the unrelenting campaign against the Hassidim, says Prof. Immanuel Etkes of Hebrew University.

The hassidic movement had started only a few years before in the Ukraine under the charismatic leadership of the Baal Shem Tov. The Vilna Gaon beard about it from rabbinical scholars living in White Russia to which the movement had spread. According to Etkes, the Gaon was told that the Hassidim despised scholars and gave gravely distorted interpretations to the mystic writings of the Kabbala. In addition, their practices seemed weird to the point of madness. Their ecstatic prayer involved shouting and jumping and, in some cases, Hassidim predated prayers with handstands in order to purge their ego by acts of apparent foolishness. One of the Baal Shem Tov's most startling innovations was his total rejection of asceticism, including fasting. A Hassidic document says "the pleasures of this world were not created only for the wicked."

Etkes believes that beyond these reports, the Vilna Gaon linked the Hassidim with the trauma left behind by Shabbai Zvi the previous century. That self-proclaimed Messiah, who had persuaded much of the Jewish people to believe in him, converted to Islam when the Ottoman authorities threatened him with execution. Many of his followers, however, continued to believe in him. Underground Sabbatean groups were still active a century later when another charismatic eccentric, Jacob Frank, recruited them to his own movement. Proclaiming the period to be one of Messianic redemption, Frank ruled that in such a time, forbidden acts were not only permitted but were a commandment, a "mitzva." These acts included sexual orgies and the eating of non-kosher food. When the authorities cracked down on the Frankists, they sought protection of church officials by agreeing to testify that Jews were using the blood of Christian children in the making of matzo.

"No doubt the Gaon suspected that the Hassidim were a sect like the Frankists," says Etkes. "He believed that hassidic leaders could perform miracles but that these did not derive from holiness but rather from satanic powers." The two hassidic rabbis from White Russia who called on the Gaon in 1772 were attempting to forestall his declaration against them, which they had learned was in the making. A few months later, the leaders of the Vilna community, including the Gaon, formally proclaimed Hassidism to be heresy.

The conflict between Hassidim and their opponents lasted for three decades. It included economic boycotts, threats of excommunication and bans on hassidic prayers by many Jewish communities. Under the Vilna Gaon's successor, Hayim of Volozhin, the conflict became less emotional and more intellectual. "He acknowledged that the Hassidim are not heretics and that they have positive motivation even though they were headed in a dangerous direction," says Etkes. Tensions between the two camps subsided even more over time as they both faced the growing challenge of secularization among the Jews.

Today, the distinction between them is still evident in Israel's political arena where the "Lithuanian" yeshiva world is represented by the Degel Hatorah Party, while Hassidim are concentrated within Agudat Yisrael. But conflict and accusations of heresy are a distant memory.

Is there then a reassuring motif here for the Jewish people in its present Orthodox-Reform predicament? "I'm afraid not," says Etkes. "What made it possible for Hassidim and their opponents to reach a kind of coexistence was the fact that both acknowledged the authority of Halacha. Once there is a movement which doesn't acknowledge the Halacha's authority or interprets Halacha differently, this is a split that cannot be bridged in the same way."

It might, however, be bridged in another way, a national way, Etkes believes. "If we take religion as the criterion for defining Judaism, it would be very difficult to reach any agreement. But if we agree that the Jewish nation is made up of Orthodox, Reform, and Conservative, religious and secular, and that what is common to all is involvement in the fate of the Jewish people and commitment to the welfare of the state of Israel, then what they have in common goes beyond religion."

If there is something to be learned from the history of past schisms, it is perhaps that the Jewish world is now caught up in a process likely to be of long duration and unpredictable outcome.

Yitzhak Mordechai waves goodbye to bachelorhood. (A. Jaronowski)

Mordechai defenseless against love

Notwithstanding all the hoopla in the Likud for and against primaries, ministerial duties et al., Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai has managed to take some time out for his own private pleasures, such as his wedding yesterday to Kochava Shimshi. Shas spiritual mentor, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef officiated at the ceremony held at Mordechai's home in Motza Ilit. Prior to the nuptials, the couple visited the Tel Aviv Furniture Exhibition, where they displayed particular interest in kitchens. The 25-year-old bride, who left it almost to the last moment to buy a wedding outfit, claims not to be concerned about the age difference between her and her 53-year-old husband. However, she may discover in time that she has more in common with his children, Sagit, 23, and Ofer, 22.

And from neighboring Hungary, there was an even more famous expatriate — Israel's internationally acclaimed writer and humorist Ephraim Kishon.

RETURNING to Israel sporting a becoming new hairdo with a gamin cut, Catherine Manning, wife of British ambassador David Manning, is now shopping around for an Israeli addresser who can keep it looking good.

JERUSALEM has the City of David and Eilat is about to get the City of Solomon — a tourist complex named for King Solomon's famous copper mines. The project has been launched by Africa Israel Hotels and Resorts, which has business interests with Holiday Inn and other international chains. Dani Palti, Africa Israel general manager, announced plans with other investors this week for another joint-venture theme park at Mahanayim Junction in Upper Galilee. Palti hosted a dinner at the Holiday Inn Crown Plaza, Tel Aviv, to celebrate the new enterprise which will include the first Holiday Inn Express Hotel in Israel.

RETIRED diplomats are not necessarily put out to pasture. Several of them were on the payroll of the late Shaul Eisenberg. Others find new expression for their hobbies. Case in point is former ambassador Mickey Bavi, an avid collector of rare classical recordings. Bavi will soon be hosting a weekly one-hour program on The Voice of Music and will share a large segment of his collection with listeners. Bavi is better known in the Foreign Ministry for his sense of humor. For the 40th anniversary of the state, he edited a booklet of some of the funniest and most ludicrous dispatches sent home by Israeli envoys abroad, but was careful to exclude the names of the dispatchers lest they be embarrassed by the contents at a later point in their careers. The booklet is still a hit today and people are clamoring for updates. Some of the best dispatches, especially on April Fool's Day, were composed by Attorney General Elyakim Rubinfeld and former consul general in New York Colette Avital.

IS IT sentiment or merely a chance to cash in on the magic associated with Diana, Princess of Wales? One of the more recent efforts to bask in the radiance of her legacy is by the Princess Hotel, Eilat, whose general manager Ziv Goldstein has written to Prince Charles informing him that the hotel management has decided to dedicate its presidential suite to the memory of the princess. The hotel will be flexible about the date of the dedication ceremony but would like to invite the British ambassador and possibly a representative of the royal family.

COSMETICS queen Pina Rosenblum, who plans to run for a seat in the next Knesset, is meanwhile putting her administrative and social skills to good use. She recently accepted the chairmanship of the Association of Friends of Ilan, the Israel foundation for handicapped children.

WHAT does it take to break up a friendship? In the case of Winona Ryder and Gwyneth Paltrow, it was a misplaced script. When Ryder allowed Paltrow to stay in her New York apartment while she went off to London for a film shoot, she left behind the script of Shakespeare in Love. Paltrow found it, read it, went after the coveted female lead role and got it. For Ryder, who had set her heart on the part, it was a bitter lesson in treachery.

If the stock market plunge caught you by surprise, maybe it's time to rethink your investment strategies. A well-planned portfolio that includes holdings in financial futures and options can make volatility work in your favor.

Although futures and options are well-known vehicles for speculators, the serious investor can use them as a protective hedge against market fluctuations as well.

Neeman: Strikes will accelerate privatization

By DAVID HARRIS

If strikes continue in the public sector, the government will be forced to speed up its privatization program and sell additional state assets, Finance Minister Yaakov Neeman warned yesterday.

Neeman was speaking to Tel Aviv businesspeople before meeting with Histadrut chairman Amir Peretz today.

"If the strikes continue and if the sanctions continue, there'll be no choice other than to privatize in other areas for which the government is responsible," said Neeman.

Earlier in the day Neeman fired a warning shot at the Knesset Finance Committee regarding the 1998 state budget. If MKs do not accept the government-proposed budget and insist on additional public expenditure, the bill will have to be footed by the public, said Neeman.

Speaking at the opening of the committee's budget debate, Neeman said he values and welcomes the opinions and proposals of Knesset members, but insisted the general framework of the budget must remain intact.

The plenum approved the budget at its first reading late Wednesday by 48 votes to 44, but Treasury officials are already admitting that it will be far more difficult to push the proposals through the committee stage, followed by the second and third readings.

Committee chairman Avraham

Ravitz (United Torah Judaism) has promised he will try to muster a united approach to the budget within the ranks of the coalition. However, Geshet representative and coalition coordinator on the committee Michael Kleiner has already signalled his dissatisfaction with the proposals by staying away from Wednesday night's plenary sitting.

The government also faces internal dissent regarding its NIS 207.4 billion package from Yisrael Ba'alya and Shas MKs, with opposition to planned education cuts also expected from National Religious Party politicians.

Once again, Neeman told MKs he is happy to receive their alternative budgetary proposals as long as they do not involve added government expenditure, which would have to be met by increased taxation.

Meanwhile, many of the planned improvements to the country's railways will have to be put on hold or abandoned, because the Treasury is not abiding by its promise to transfer NIS 300 million to Israel Railways in 1998, Amos Uzani, the organization's director-general, claimed yesterday. The railway budget will stand at NIS 195m., from which VAT will be deducted and NIS 35m. will be handed over to the Ports and Railways Authority.

"There are many nice things said about the railways and the fact that we need it," said Uzani. "But when it boils down to it, there's far less substance."

PM: Gov't will form large R&D fund with commercial firms

Globes Business News

The government is working to set up a large research and development fund in conjunction with the private sector, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu told a meeting of the National Economic Forum yesterday.

Netanyahu presented the need to increase investment in R&D as one of the government's main priorities within existing budget constraints. Another, he said, is to boost the technological manpower pool. A plan is taking shape for increasing the number of technological education graduates from 1,000 to 3,000 within four years, the prime minister said.

Only after the Israeli economy achieves these two goals can steps be taken towards achieving a third goal - acquiring overseas marketing channels. The absence of these at present is arresting growth, he said.

At this stage, Netanyahu said, Israeli companies are not big enough to set up corporations that can break into world markets, as Japanese corporations are doing. "To date, the government has privatized assets amounting to NIS 9 billion," he said. "I intend to carry on with the privatization of services."

Netanyahu estimated that in 1998, accelerated economic growth will resume earlier than the government had anticipated, because of a flow of new investments to Israel.

"The transition to accelerated growth will take less time than we thought, since the outside investments response is creating a new situation," added Netanyahu.

Other things the government is planning include the development of infrastructure for railroad, aviation and toll roads and the addition of 150 gas stations. The government will also propose comprehensive tax reform.

Unemployment stabilizes at 7.8%

By Jerusalem Post Staff

Unemployment averaged 7.8 percent during July and August, according to figures published this week by the Central Bureau of Statistics.

The jobless rate has stabilized at this level since June, after dropping to 6.4% in the March-April period. Despite the general trend of rising unemployment, the actual number of working people has remained stable since January. Wages, meanwhile, rose some 1% in annualized terms in July. These initial statistics are a part of the bureau's report on main economic indicators for August and September. The data also point to dwindling domestic demand and exports, accompanied by a slowdown in the pace of industrial production growth. Whereas in April industrial production grew by a yearly 7% to 8%, that rate had shrunk to 4% by August.

In other economic indicators, the number of hotel nights dropped in annual terms by 13% to 14% in August-September, following a fall of 10% to 12% between May and July.

The consumer price index rose at an annual 7% in September, down from 9% in July and August.

The shekel exchange rate against the basket of major currencies (the US dollar, Japanese yen, German mark, British pound and French franc) increased 1% in July and September, following an annualized 11% rise from April to June.

Economic growth continued at an annual 2% between April and September, according to a separate report released yesterday by the research department of the Bank of Israel. The reasons it gave for the slowdown include a reduction in the contribution by new immigrants, a reduction in consumer demand, and ongoing political uncertainty.

Inflation in the year to September 30 reached 8.7%, compared to 9.3% in August and 8% in May. Inflationary expectations for the coming 12 months ranged between 8.5% and 9.5% during the May to September period.

The next economic indicator to be published (probably on Sunday) is the government's budget performance during the first 10 months of the year.

Elron buys ON Technology assets

By JENNIFER FRIEDLIN

Elron Electronic Industries Ltd., a high-tech holding company based in Haifa, yesterday announced an agreement to acquire ON Technology Corporation's network management and network security business assets for $12 million in cash, plus an additional payment based on the performance of the product lines.

The deal is subject to the approval of ON's shareholders. The Cambridge, Massachusetts-based company trades on the Nasdaq stock exchange.

As a result of the acquisition, Elron, whose shares are traded on the Nasdaq market and on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, will establish Elron Software Inc., which will form the company's network management division. Elron will receive control of ON Technology's Internet software and fire wall security products.

Elron said that it decided to purchase ON as part of its strategy to expand into new technology markets.

"Elron Software will advance our strategic commitment to information technology by creating an entirely new market-driven concept for delivering Israeli technologies into worldwide markets," Elron CEO Uzia Galil said in a statement.

Elron Software Inc. will retain about 100 ON employees. Elron has holdings in the medical diagnostic imaging, advanced defense electronics, communication, semiconductor, and machine vision fields. The group generated revenues of $1.2 billion last year. Eighty-seven percent of the company's sales went to exports.

IMF begins annual review

By DAVID HARRIS

The annual visit of International Monetary Fund economists begins this weekend, the Bank of Israel said.

The team of four economists will meet business and government representatives including Finance Minister Yaakov Neeman and Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel. The team, headed by IMF European division deputy director Yosuko Horiguchi, will complete its work here by November 12, when it will present Neeman and Frenkel with its initial findings on the shape of the Israeli economy.

Upon their return to Washington, group members will write a detailed report, which will then be considered by the IMF board.

The 1996 IMF report blasted the Labor government's "departure from fiscal consolidation" and "expansionary fiscal policy." This, the report claimed, led to a worsening of the current-account deficit, a surge in consumer imports, and accelerating inflation.

The IMF recommended the government continue its budget cuts program, reduce spending and implement its structural reform program, in was essentially a vote of support for the Bank of Israel-Finance Ministry's efforts to put the economy back on track.

While pointing to the economic difficulties being experienced, the report also suggested that implementation of these measures should be sufficient to bring a return to higher growth levels.

The security source discounted the notion that the botched attack on Mas'hal would serve as a deterrent to the Mossad: "They are now burning with ambition to show that their ability to carry out such an operation still exists," he said.

"Saguy claimed that Shavit was incapable of providing the information needed to hit Saddam," reported the newsletter. "Shavit, angry, showed him detailed information about a village in northern Iraq that Saddam used as a 'hideaway' for clandestine meetings with a friend and as a base for visits to a secret military site nearby. Shavit added that the Mossad would know when his next visit was due and tip off the army. Israeli commandos could then finish the job."

Regev said he would not suggest that the American Reform movement "use as a deciding factor how [a position] would play out in Israel."

Start preparing now for a Hanukka of good cheer

By BEVERLEE BLACK

I'm told by my English associates that I have adopted the saying of a very popular BBC radio show that everyone in Britain listened to during the darkest days of the second World War: "It's being so cheerful that keeps me going."

This expression came to mind on receipt of a letter from a social worker at a municipality in the North: "I cannot express enough gratitude and appreciation for your response to my request. The beautiful new toys you have sent, in such a generous amount, have been given to the needy family and are helping the children's development immeasurably. The grateful mother has already noted a change in her children."

The Security Council, which on Wednesday warned Iraq of "serious consequences" if it did not back down, is expected to discuss Iraq again this afternoon when Australian Richard Butler, the head of UNSCOM, may report to the 15-member body. Ruben said he believed all Security Council members, including Russia, are making clear to Iraq that its attempt to discriminate between US and other UNSCOM members is unacceptable. Despite the implied threat of military force, Ruben indicated that Washington hopes diplomacy will resolve the issue, saying he doubts that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein has decided to "take this all the way to the end of the game."

those ships are capable of firing Tomahawk cruise missiles. The US fired cruise missiles at Iraq targets in 1993, in retaliation for what Washington said was a Baghdad plot to kill former US president George Bush, and again last year to punish Iraq for attacking a Kurdish faction. Bacon said the US military has no intention of complying with Iraq's demand that it halt reconnaissance overflights of Iraq in support of UN inspection teams in that country. Ruben said the arms inspector dispute is a separate issue from a deal that provides Iraq with an exemption from UN trade sanctions, allowing Baghdad to export some oil in return for imports of food and medicine. He appeared to rule out cancellation of the deal, which allows Baghdad to export $2 billion of crude every six months. The two issues "are on separate tracks and I'm not aware there would be any need to change one or the other," he said. The deal had made it easier for many countries to support the continuation of UN sanctions that were imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990, he said. Both Ruben and White House press secretary Mike McCurry said that in banning US inspectors, Saddam had "shot himself in the foot" by uniting countries that were beginning to quarrel over the sanctions issue.

The differences between the two movements came to the fore in the discussions leading up to the November 8 memorial for Rabin. Meretz and Peace Now wanted a hard-hitting, political rally. In fact, Peace Now originally scheduled a public protest for November 1 and had even printed a powerful poster showing the blood-spattered copy of the Peace Song that Rabin sang minutes before his murder. Superimposed over the blown up image were the words: "Now they are shooting at the peace, too."

ning of a wave of arousal and activity on behalf of peace. That feeling was created by the silent majority, not the political activists on the margins of society." In the end, it was Ehud Barak who determined the nature of the evening. He unilaterally decided that a rally would be held on November 8, to be organized by the Coordinating Committee, and asked Peace Now to cancel its own protest and join his. The condition was that there be no anti-government slogans but only signs relating to Rabin's assassination. Sadeh is certain that Barak's decision to hold an apolitical rally was in keeping with his recently declared intention of distancing himself from Meretz and Peace Now. "Take a look at this recent photo of demonstrators against Netanyahu in Tel Aviv from Peace Now, Dor Shalem, the Labor Party young guard and Meretz - all together," said Sadeh. "It's hard to believe we'll see another photo like it in the future. Barak's announcement has already had repercussions." The movements linked to the Labor Party are dissociating themselves from Meretz's statements and are less and less interested in appearing together with Meretz representatives." According to Janet Aviad of Peace Now, there is no doubt that the coordinated activity of the Left does not compare in effectiveness with the coordination of the right-wing movements. Yitzhak Frankenthal, the secretary-general of Netivot Shalom and a member of the Peace Movement Coordinating Committee, agrees. He claims there is virtually no cooperation. "All the left-wing groups are more interested in the well-being of their own organizations than in the overall goal," he charged.

Sarid, however, disputes the assertion that he is spoiling Barak's calculated act. "I may be doing just what Barak wants," he said. "You can't rule out the possibility that this is all pretense, that Barak wants to goad us, that he benefits from making it appear that he loathes us." "Not that I expect Barak to masquerade as Yossi Sarid. But this is a direct disparagement which even I cannot ignore. Though Rabin also sought to deny any association with Meretz when he ran for office, he never produced an

Israel women's soccer team ready to make history

By AMMANIAH de VRIES

On Sunday Israel's women's national soccer squad will be making history as they kick off their first-ever official international match.

The best eleven woman soccer players in the country will pit their skills against a much more experienced and well-established Romanian side in the first of eight qualifying matches which could lead to a spot in Women's World Cup '99.

The road which led to this historic and unprecedented event began in late April of this year. It was then that Israel Football Association decided to build a women's national soccer team. The goal was to get the team into shape before the first world cup qualifying match in early November. That gave the association only seven months.

With this goal in mind tryouts were held in early May and four regional teams were created, the North, the Center, the Sharon, and the South.

After each of these four squads had held biweekly training sessions for nearly four months, matches between them were begun to further determine which lucky women would make it to the final cut for the national side.

After a grueling round-robin style tournament, in which all the women displayed their soccer skills, motivation and team spirit, the final selection was made in late September.

The twenty six best women were invited at the end of September to commence training for the Romanians.

The squad has now been pared down to the final 18 who will take to the field wearing Israel's blue and white on Sunday.

Never before has there been a female Israeli national soccer side, although the 1999 Women's World Cup will be the third tournament of its kind. Sixteen countries will play in the finals, to be held in the US.

In Europe alone, 34 countries are now playing qualifying matches. Israel is in European qualifying group 8, along with Romania, Bosnia, Hungary and Slovakia.

So far the following results have been registered in the group: Hungary 10, Bosnia 0; Romania 4, Bosnia 0, and Romania 1, Slovakia 1.

Romania appear to be the favorite to win the group with Hungary expected to give a good fight.

Israel coach Roni Schneider believes that Sunday's match will be a very tough battle.

"I hope that we will be able to compete with the physical power and the speed of the Romanians," he said. "I have two very quick forwards up front and also a very big, strong half-back."

Also, Israel's star player, Silvi Jam, has returned from Norway where she plays in the professional women's league, to lend her talent and experience.

The match kicks off at 14:30 in the Bat Yam soccer stadium.

Obziler only local left in Sherman Challenger

By HEATHER CHAIT

Shippi Obziler is the only blue-and-white representative in the semi-finals of the $25,000 Marjorie Sherman Challenger at the Ramat Hasharon courts today.

Obziler, unseeded in the tournament, defeated the No. 3 seed Petra Rampre from Slovenia 6-7(5), 6-4, 6-4 yesterday.

Top seed Anna Smashnova succumbed in a closely-contested match to Katarina Srebotnik, also from Slovenia.

Smashnova went down in a final-set tiebreak to lose 6-2, 4-6, 7-6(5).

The other players in the semi-finals are fourth seed Petra Gaspar from Hungary who beat Italy's Giulia Casoni 7-6(2), 6-4, and Adriana Sera-Zanetti, also Italian, who squeezed past Germany's Kirstin Freye 6-3, 4-6, 7-6(2).

Obziler will face Sera-Zanetti (10:30 a.m.) and Gaspar will play Srebotnik.

In the doubles, Hila Rosen and Freye have reached final where they will meet Srebotnik and Rampre at 1 p.m. today.

Yesterday the Rosen-Frey duo, the top seeds, beat Casoni and Maja Zivec-Skulj (Germany) 6-2, 6-2.

The singles final begins at 10:30 a.m. tomorrow.

Buoyant after World Cup game, Milosevic faces Zola, Di Matteo

LONDON (AP) - Savo Milosevic likely will have a huge grin on his face when he runs out for Aston Villa tomorrow and greets Chelsea stars Gianfranco Zola and Roberto Di Matteo.

Scorer of Yugoslavia's seventh goal in Budapest Wednesday, he knows he's virtually sure of playing in next summer's World Cup while the two Italians have more work to do against Russia.

By the time Milosevic entered the playoff game against Hungary Wednesday, the Yugoslavs were already 6-0 up and his goal was a simple close range tap in. Yugoslavia won the game 7-1 and now has to avoid a seven-goal defeat in Belgrade.

By contrast, Di Matteo battled through the snow and mud in Moscow to help Italy to a hard-earned 1-1 tie. Zola didn't play, but Italy likely will use his imaginative skills in the second leg in Naples Nov. 15.

One Villa team-mate unlikely to share the Milosevic joy will be Steve Stanton. He was on the Irish team held 1-1 at home by Belgium in another World Cup playoff. That result means the Irish must score and avoid defeat in Brussels in the return leg.

Sasa Curcic, another Yugoslav on the Villa team, may have mixed feelings.

No doubt delighted his country is almost sure of playing in the World Cup, he has lost his place on the team after falling out with coach Slobodan Santrac and may not be considered for the team in France.

So far as tomorrow's game is concerned, both teams need a victory to boost morale.

Although Villa fought out a 0-0 draw Arsenal Sunday, its previous result was a 2-1 home loss to Wimbledon. Chelsea comes off a 1-0 defeat at lowly Bolton.

Those results dropped Chelsea to fifth and Villa to 13th and, although both are healthily placed in European competition next week, the managers of both teams know that league results must improve.

Leader Manchester United, which visits Feyenoord in the Champions Cup Wednesday, has what should be an easy league game tomorrow against next-to-last Sheffield Wednesday. Last weekend, it hosted last place Barnsley and won 7-0.

Arsenal, which surrendered the lead after failing to beat Villa, visits seventh place Derby.

Third place Blackburn will be confident of gaining three points at Barnsley while Leicester, which has climbed to fourth after some impressive performances, hopes to gain another upset win, this time at shaky Newcastle.

Mike Tyson hurt in motorcycle accident

HARTFORD, Conn. (Reuters) - Former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson fractured several ribs and is in a hospital in stable condition after his motorcycle turned over, a Hartford Hospital spokesman said on Wednesday.

The accident occurred on a highway exit ramp in Manchester, Connecticut, about 20 minutes from Hartford, near where Tyson has a home.

"He's being admitted for about 48 hours," said James Battaglio, vice president of communications for the hospital.

Battaglio quoted Tyson saying he was only going about 20 miles an hour when his motorcycle hit a patch of sand and turned over.

Tyson, 31, went home for about four hours but returned to the hospital, apparently because of the pain to his ribs, Battaglio said. He said Tyson fractured his "upper ribs on the right side." He said the injuries would have no impact on Tyson's boxing career once they healed.

Tyson lost a bid to regain the heavyweight championship last June when he was disqualified for biting off a piece of Evander Holyfield's ear in their rematch in Las Vegas.

Tyson was banned from boxing for at least a year and fined $3 million for that incident.

In 1992, Tyson was convicted of raping a beauty pageant contestant in Indianapolis and served three years in prison.

Derby day for Tel Aviv

By ORI LEWIS

There's only one show in the Big Orange tomorrow, it's the Tel Aviv derby, and for a change, Hapoel are the favorites.

It has been many years since Hapoel were in the prestigious position of not only holding the hegemony of the big city, but also leading the National League.

Tomorrow at Bloomfield, there will be a packed house of 20,000 spectators, most of them sporting the red of Hapoel as the hosts try to make sure they stay masters of Tel Aviv.

Hapoel sit atop the league now in splendid isolation after Hapoel Jerusalem lost for the first time last week. The Tel Avivians have yet to lose a match this season.

Maccabi, on the other hand, won for the first time in the league this season last weekend, when they beat Maccabi Herzliya. That win took them off the bottom of the table, but they are still precariously placed, and another win is vital if the yellow-and-blue revival is to be seen as real.

Betar Jerusalem will be awaiting signs of weakness from Bloomfield with great eagerness. Despite the severe blows of having lost Stefan Salci and Eli Ohana to injuries, the Jerusalemites have leapt up the table into second place. If Hapoel Tel Aviv lose, Betar are waiting to take over at the top. They travel to Maccabi Herzliya.

This weekend's National League fixtures (all matches tomorrow unless stated): Hapoel Beersheva v. Hapoel Kfar Sava, Beersheva 14:30; Hapoel Petah Tikva v. Ironi Rishon LeZion, Petah Tikva 14:30; Hapoel Ashdod v. Hapoel Haifa, Ashdod, today 14:30; Maccabi Herzliya v. Betar Jerusalem, Herzliya 15:00; Hapoel Tel Aviv v. Maccabi Tel Aviv, Bloomfield 17:45; Hapoel Jerusalem v. Ironi Ashdod, Teddy Stadium 15:00; Maccabi Haifa v. Maccabi Petah Tikva, Kiryat Eliezer 16:00; Be'er Yehuda v. Hapoel Beit She'an, Hativva Quarter 14:30.

NBA's first female refs ready to deal with the bad boys

NEW YORK (AP) - Don't mess with Dee Kantner or Violet Palmer.

The NBA's first women referees aren't going to be bullied by bad boys like Dennis Rodman and Charles Barkley.

"We'll treat them just like any other player," Palmer said during a conference call Wednesday night. "Confrontation is part of being a referee. If they cross a line they're not supposed to, they'll get a technical like any other player." With the NBA season starting tonight, Kantner and Palmer will soon become the first women to officiate regular-season games in a major US professional sports league.

The NBA won't say where or when the female refs will make their debuts, although Palmer's parents were reportedly heading to Vancouver, where the Grizzlies play Dallas tonight and Sacramento tomorrow night.

Kantner was surprised by all the attention she and Palmer got after they were hired Tuesday. "I'm really stumped by the response we're getting," she said. "We just followed a path that was laid out for us." Both women have officiated NBA exhibition games the last two years and worked NBA summer league games the last three years.

They also have refereed women's professional and college games. "I think Dee and I were selected on our ability," Palmer said. "We didn't have to fight to get to this point. We've been given an opportunity, and we're going to do the job to the best of our ability." Kantner, 37, said she didn't start out to be a trailblazer for women in sports.

"I don't think Violet or I could say this was our intent," she said. "But if one of the after effects is that women are given more opportunities, we're obviously in favor of that."

While some players have expressed reservations about female refs working in an all-male league, Kantner and Palmer said they didn't encounter any major problems during exhibition games.

"I think we've already been accepted," the 33-year-old Palmer said. "The players already know who we are or have heard of us or know something about us."

Rodman, the Chicago Bulls forward known for his outrageous looks and behavior, said female refs have "got to be ready to run with us on the court, get touched and even get a pat on the (behind) every now and then, like male officials."

Kantner said that type of contact wouldn't bother her, as long as it was done in the right spirit.

"That's not something we're going to misinterpret," she said. However, Kantner added that if a player intentionally tries to offend one of the female refs, "we'll handle it accordingly."

Both women said they have given up their non-basketball jobs to become full-time refs. Kantner was a sales engineer in Charlotte, North Carolina, while Palmer was a recreational director in Los Angeles.

Becker bids Paris au revoir

Pete Sampras forced Boris Becker to say goodbye to the French capital on Wednesday night for probably the last time in his tennis career, beating him 7-6 3-6 6-3 in the second round of the indoor Paris Open. Sampras said of his rival: "It's always been tough matches, important matches against him, especially as the French crowd have always been behind him." Now the season is almost over for Becker, who will for once miss the ATP Tour finals this month in Hanover. "I played one of the best matches of my career against him in Hanover last year. He's gonna be missed there," Sampras said.

Rusedski all but clinches spot in ATP finals

PARIS (Reuters) - Greg Rusedski dismissed Czech Bohdan Uhlirach 7-5 6-3 at the $2.5 million Paris Open yesterday to virtually qualify and become the first Briton ever to reach the ATP Tour finals.

"It is nice if I have made it on paper and mathematically. But I'm still looking to do well here this week and hopefully it is not my first and last time into the finals," said the tournament fourth seed.

ATP Tour officials said the US Open finalist had not yet officially qualified for next month's Hanover event but a win in the quarter-finals against Russia's Yevgeny Kafelnikov would certainly do the trick.

His triumph over Uhlirach made the Canadian-born Briton confident he could go on beating national records and, with compatriot Tim Henman, write a new chapter in the history of British tennis after 20 years of oblivion.

"I have had a few (records) this year, so why not continue," he said. "I will be the first British player

Dallas beats Washington, extends winning streak

LANDOVER, Maryland (AP) - Benoit Hogue scored his first goal of the season with 17:22 left as the Dallas Stars extended their winning streak to four games with a 4-3 comeback victory over the Washington Capitals on Wednesday night.

Greg Adams had a goal and an assist for the Capitals, now winless in their last four games (0-3-1). Washington, playing at home for the first time in 19 days, was 3-0-0 at the USAirways Arena this season.

Senators 5, Lightning 2 In Tampa, Florida, Shawn McEachern had two goals and Ron Tugnutt stopped 23 shots, lifting the Ottawa Senators over the Tampa Bay Lightning.

Tugnutt, who entered game with an NHL-best 1.35 goals-against average, was especially strong in the first period. Tugnutt faced 11 shots, many of them quality scoring chances, and allowed only Paul Ysebaert's 2-on-1 short-handed goal - his first of two.

The Lightning are winless (0-3-1) in their last nine games, matching the all-time mark set during the 1993-94 season. Tampa Bay has been outscored 35-11 during the current skid and haven't scored a power-play goal (0-30) in its

'Warm English soccer players about betting'

LONDON (Reuters) - English soccer authorities should launch a campaign to stop players gambling on the game, a British report on betting in soccer found yesterday. An inquiry found that players were disregarding the present anti-betting rules of the English FA "to a significant extent" but found no evidence of corruption.

"The use of information from 'inside' the professional game when used to gain an advantage, is akin to 'insider trading' and is therefore unfair to others," said Sir John Smith who headed the inquiry.

"Whatever the reasons, widespread betting by players and others in the game is damaging to the integrity of professional football."

Smith called on all officials to play a role in teaching the players the rules.

Dallaglio offers England a fresh start

LONDON (Reuters) - Sitting in a Milan restaurant, an attractive deal including a home and a place at university on the table, Lawrence Dallaglio was once hugely tempted to stay full-time in the land of his father and sign up to play rugby for Italy.

Six years on, the uncertain student has instead graduated to the toughest job in English rugby, picked ahead of British Lions leader Martin Johnson as the man to inspire his country against the best of the southern hemisphere next month.

Italy's loss has unquestionably been Clive Woodward's gain. The new England coach has been keen to give the national team a fresh invigorating shake for the forthcoming Tests against Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, and in Dallaglio he has picked a man who shares many of his beliefs.

While Johnson is a man-of-few-words captain, Dallaglio is both personable and media-friendly in the way all English captains seemingly have to be since Will Carling popularised the job.

He also has a presence which England team manager Roger Uytendaele compares to Willie John McBride, the legendary Irish captain of the unbeaten 1974 Lions.

"When he walks into a room you are aware of it. People like him have something in their personalities that makes people prepared to follow them," says Uytendaele, closely involved in Dallaglio's development at his club Wasps.

"He is respected by his peers, is a great player and is worth his place in the team. He just stands out as a leader of men." After 12 caps for England, the 25-year-old from west London was an automatic choice in the back-row even before Wednesday's announcement.

It has always required something special to impress England supreme Fran Cotton, who made no secret of his support for Johnson in the captaincy race.

But even the Lions manager returned home

BORN LEADER - Lawrence Dallaglio.

from the South Africa tour earlier this year as confirmed Dallaglio fan.

"Lawrence was immense," admitted Cotton, who picked him for all three Tests against the Springboks.

"He is now a world-class blind-side and everything about him - his attitude, work-rate and defence was outstanding. He had all the qualities we were looking for." All the plaudits make it seem strange that Dallaglio was ever passed over for the job 12 months ago when Phil de Claville was given the nod by Jack Rowell. The then-coach clearly felt it was premature to give the captaincy to a player with less than a year's Test experience, ignoring the fact that Dallaglio has long been mature beyond his years.

A contributory factor was the death of his sister in a pleasure boat disaster on the River Thames when he was just 16.

Bulgarian international Yordanov has MS

LISBON (AP) - Bulgarian international Ivaylo Yordanov yesterday vowed to keep playing soccer despite being diagnosed with multiple sclerosis.

"I'm not going to give in. I'll fight to the end," the 29-year-old player told a news conference at his club Sporting Lisbon.

Yordanov has missed training the past two months but returned to the team Tuesday. His absence was never fully explained by his club, which said only that he was ill.

"I hope I'll be able to play again soon," Yordanov said, adding that he was determined to keep playing as long as he was physically able. Club officials declined to speculate about whether he would be restored to the playing roster.

The disease affects the nervous system and gradually impairs motor control, with symptoms appearing at irregular intervals for years. Although it may result in severe disability, it is seldomly rapidly fatal.

Ski group head threatens Olympic pullout

NAGANO, Japan (Reuters) - The head of international skiing threatened yesterday to pull skiing out of February's Winter Olympics if organizers of the Games go ahead with a plan to ban recreational skiing above a disputed downhill run.

"We may pull out of the Games and have no skiing at all, not even jumping, not even cross country - nothing," International Ski Federation (FIS) President Marc Hodler said after arriving in Nagano for a meeting of the International Olympic Committee (IOC) Coordination Council.

Agassi gets wildcard for Australian Open

MELBOURNE (Reuters) - Former world No. 1 Andre Agassi has been granted a wildcard entry into the 1998 Australian Open, tournament organizers said yesterday.

Agassi, who won the Australian Open in 1995, applied for a wildcard because his current world ranking of 140 was too low to get him into the field.

Tournament Director Paul McNamee said Agassi's performance at the recent US Open, where he reached the round of 16, was proof that the American remained a force in the game.

Eric Davis receives Hutch Award

SEATTLE (Reuters) - Baltimore Orioles outfielder Eric Davis, who battled colon cancer and returned to play this season, received his second major award in the last week on Wednesday by being named recipient of the 1997 Hutch Award.

Davis, who has also received the Roberto Clemente Award, batted .304 with eight homers and 25 RBI in 158 at-bats this season. He returned late in the regular season and competed in the post-season despite taking chemotherapy treatment.

The Hutch Award is named after former major league pitcher and manager Fred Hutchinson, who died of cancer in 1964, and honors qualities such as dedication to team, community and family, as well as competitive spirit and the ability to battle through adversity.

Past winners of the Hutch Award include Mickey Mantle, Sandy Koufax, Carl Yastrzemski, Pete Rose, Lou Brock, George Brett and Tony Conigliaro.

Australian cricket cap will stay special

SYDNEY (AP) - Australia's Cricket Board said it would never sell copies of the national team's famous "baggy green cap" despite a push to make more money from official merchandise.

Australia's national sport revealed its financial state publicly for the first time Wednesday and the move revealed income from merchandise was well below potential.

The cap given to players when they are called up for test duty bears the Australian coat of arms and the ACB's marketing manager said it would stay "sacrosanct" along with the team blazer and jumper.

The ACB is in dispute with the country's professionals, who want a larger share of revenue and power.

ACB figures revealed just $490,000 (US) came from sales of cricket shirts, hats and other items.

Australian Rules football earns $3.5 million a year from merchandise while rugby league and rugby union make about $700,000 each.

The Australian Cricketers' Association, representing the players, believes overall merchandising revenue should be greater, given that $4.8 million is spent on marketing.

ACB marketing manager David Fovvy said there were no plans to sell the cap to the public despite other national teams selling replicas of their outfits.

"Sell the cap? You can't say that, it's sacrosanct," Fovvy yesterday.

"I'm sure plenty of people would want to buy it and it would be worth a fair few dollars to us but everybody knows the only way you can get it is to be one of the 12 players representing Australia in a Test. That's the beauty of the baggy green."

The Australian Rugby Union was criticized for changing its traditional gold Wallaby jersey this year for a new multicolored version in exchange for sponsor dollars.
